Group offers way out of abyss of extremism

Works to counter online preying upon vulnerable youths

By Kay Lazar

It started with three FBI agents, joined by several police officers, knocking on the front door one afternoon nearly six years ago.

"We have to talk to you about your son," the agents said. The 15-year-old had been talking online with a terrorist group about building bombs, they said.

Suddenly, the Massachusetts parents, whose biggest concern before that knock was refinancing their home for a better interest rate, were plunged into a frightening world of hate and extremism.

"I didn't even know how to process any of it," the boy's father said in a recent interview. The parents asked to remain anonymous for fear their other children would be bullied and the family judged as radical extremists. "It's not who we are," the father said.

Then began the family's painful six-year journey toward deradicalization for the teen, even as the number of hate incidents and access to extremist propaganda steadily grew nationwide.

Eventually, they found their way to a nonprofit group called Parents for Peace, based in Brookline, which runs a confi-

STORM ON ABORTION RAINS DOWN ON OHIO

With restrictions looming, a citizen-led bid to ensure reproductive rights puts the state in the US spotlight

CINCINNATI — Thousands of red-clad fans teemed around downtown on the day the Cincinnati Reds were set to open their season against the Pittsburgh Pirates, and Kathy, a volunteer, mingled among them. Armed with a clipboard and pen, the longtime Cincinnati resident saw the fans not as fans, but as voters who could help add a proposal to protect abortion rights to the November ballot.

"This is something that my generation and my peers never had to worry about," said Kathy, 65, who asked that her last name not be used. "And now you've got politicians making the calls. ... I just never thought that Roe v. Wade would be overturned."

She is part of an effort to protect abortion rights by bypassing the Legislature in a state that has a real possibility of restrictions looming overhead — one six-week ban that was temporarily in effect last year has been halted by a court. If the effort to pass the abortion-access language succeeded, the constitutional amendment would, in part, guarantee that "every individual has a right to make and carry out one's own reproductive decisions, including but not limited to decisions on" contraception, fertility treatment, continuing a pregnancy, miscarriages, and abortion.

Not every state has a citizen-led pathway to enshrine the right to an abortion in its state constitution, but among those that do, the move is gaining traction as a way to protect reproductive

A hunt to keep bank runs from going viral

Regulators seek tools after speed of SVB collapse stuns industry

By Jim Puzzanghera

WASHINGTON — In the largest bank failure in US history, panicked customers of struggling Washington Mutual Bank withdrew $16.7 billion over a 10-day period in September 2008. But the recent run on Silicon Valley Bank made that seem as antiquated as paper paychecks.

In just a single day, a staggering $42 billion streamed out of SVB on March 9. With another $100 billion in withdrawals queued up for the next morning, regulators seized the bank in the second-largest — and fastest ever — US failure.

Bank runs used to take several days or even weeks before they toppled an institution. But accelerated by social media and online banking, SVB imploded in roughly 24 hours in what House Financial Services Committee Chair Patrick McHenry labeled "the first Twitter fueled bank run." Now regulators, lawmakers, bankers, and industry experts are trying to determine if changes are needed to prevent another run from going viral.

Potential reforms include requiring regulators to monitor social media for signs of panic, revising models for how quickly deposits could be drained from an institution, and developing some sort of circuit-breaker — a modern version of the Great Depression's bank holiday — to pause a run.

"This failure should rewrite the rule book because the regulators just learned that failures are measured in hours now, not days and weeks," said Jaret Seiberg, a

NYC prepares for spectacle of Trump's arraignment

Security tight, streets to be closed as protests expected

By Jesse McKinley and Chelsia Rose Marcius

NEW YORK — Even for a city accustomed to celebrity appearances, the two-day visit during which Donald Trump is expected to be arraigned in Manhattan is likely to be a striking spectacle: There will be protests and celebrations, an all-hands-on-deck police presence, and a crush of media attention on the moment in which the first American president is charged with a crime.

Trump is expected to arrive in New York on Monday from his estate in Florida and head to his erstwhile home in Trump Tower, where he began his pursuit of the presidency in 2015 by descending a golden escalator. The exact timing of the former president's arrival was unclear, though he was expected to stay the night there before heading to a courthouse in Lower Manhattan on Tuesday.

Law enforcement officials and outside experts have not warned of major threats from Trump's supporters or opponents this week. But New York City officials and police were girding for protests near the courthouse and outside Trump Tower on Fifth Avenue, where barricades lined the streets for several blocks surrounding the building Sunday, amid camera crews and curiosity seekers.

On guard for rise in problem gambling

Addiction experts watch as legal sports betting takes hold

By Felice J. Freyer

"Gambling problem?" Those words, which appear on the ads for online sports betting that have proliferated in recent weeks, have elicited two types of responses.

Some people mistakenly think the phone number provided — 1-800-327-5050 — is for customer service, and their problem involves using the betting app.

Others often understand all too well what "gambling problem" means, and call the state's gambling help line to ask for support resisting a new temptation.

These callers are not alone in their anxieties. Since sports betting on mobile phones was legalized in Massachusetts on March 10, advocates worry that this new form of gambling, so easily accessible in the palm of one's hand, might lead to an increase in problem gambling.

"You can now gamble anywhere," said Rebecca Bishop, director of the Massachusetts Center of Excellence on Problem Gambling Prevention. "You can gamble at home, at school, at work, even treatment programs."

Still, it's too soon to know the full consequences of the state's expanded gambling landscape. The help line seems to have seen an increase in call

32 dead as tornadoes move across country

Cells tore path from Arkansas to Delaware

People inspected a tornado-damaged car in Adamsville, Tenn., on Sunday, after a series of storms swept across the country.

WYNNE, Ark. — Residents across a wide swath of the country raced Sunday to assess the destruction from fierce storms that spawned possibly dozens of tornadoes from the South and the Midwest into the Northeast, killing at least 32 people.

The storms tore a path through the Arkansas capital and also collapsed the roof of a packed concert venue in Illinois, stunning people throughout the region with the scope of the damage.

The number of deaths continued to grow Sunday.

"While we are still assessing the full extent of the damage, we know families across America are mourning the loss of loved ones, desperately waiting for news of others fighting for their lives, and sorting through the rubble of their homes and businesses," President Biden said in a statement.

Biden earlier declared broad areas of the country major disaster areas, making federal resources and financial aid available for recovery.

Governor Sarah Huckabee Sanders in Arkansas, where at least five people were killed, already had declared a state of emergency and activated the National Guard.

Confirmed or suspected tornadoes in 11 states destroyed homes and businesses, splintered trees, and laid waste to neighborhoods.

The National Weather Service confirmed Sunday that a tornado was responsible for damage to several homes near Bridgeville, Del. One person was found dead inside a house heavily damaged by the storm Saturday night, Delaware State Police reported.

It may take days to confirm all the recent tornadoes. The dead included at least nine in one Tennessee county, five in Indiana, and four in Illinois.

Other deaths from the storms that hit Friday night into Saturday were reported in Alabama and Mississippi.

Residents of Wynne, Ark., a community of about 8,000 people 50 miles west of Memphis, Tennessee, woke Saturday to find the high school's roof shredded and its windows blown out. At least four people died.

Ashley Macmillan said she, her husband, and their children huddled with their dogs in a bathroom as a tornado passed, "praying and saying goodbye to each other, because we thought we were dead." A falling tree seriously damaged their home, but they escaped unhurt.

Chainsaws buzzed, as bulldozers plowed into debris. Utility crews restored power as some neighborhoods began recovery.

Tennessee recorded at least 15 deaths, including nine fatalities in McNairy County, east of Memphis, according to Patrick Sheehan, director of the Tennessee Emergency Management Agency.

Tennessee Governor Bill Lee drove to the county Saturday to tour the destruction and comfort residents. He said the storm capped the "worst" week of his time as governor, coming days after a school shooting in Nashville that killed six people, including a family friend whose funeral he and his wife just attended.

"It's terrible what has happened in this community, this county, this state," Lee said. "But it looks like your community has done what Tennessean communities do, and that is rally and respond."

Rachel Milam lived in the basement with her 6-year-old daughter, while her mother and her mother's boyfriend lived upstairs in their home on the outskirts of Waynesboro, Tenn.

All squeezed into the bathroom of the cinder block basement Friday night as the tornado approached and made whooshing sounds like a washing machine.

"As it ripped the roof off, the shower curtain fell," Milam, 26, said Sunday. "So I'm trying to dig through the shower curtain and see. I saw darkness and then rain started to fall."

Then absolute terror.

"And the house — I watched it pick up and move ... about six inches and then pick up and it was gone."

"I was just thinking it's gonna take the tub, like we're going to be gone," she said.

A piece of wood fell over them. So did a mirror. "We were fine and just thankful that we made it out alive," Milam said.

States push for school safety

Shooting boosts calls for devices

By Claire Rush
ASSOCIATED PRESS

PORTLAND, Ore. — Following the shooting deaths of three 9-year-olds and three adults in an elementary school in Tennessee last week, state legislatures across the country are moving forward with bills aiming to improve school safety.

The bills have been introduced in blue and red states alike and would require schools to install technology ranging from panic buttons, video surveillance, and emergency communications systems. Most have bipartisan support, with lawmakers seeing them as a way to boost school security while avoiding political gridlock on the hot-button issue of gun control. But some experts say teacher safety training is more effective and less expensive than the new technologies, which also can require upgrades or ongoing maintenance that may not be funded.

That hasn't stopped states from Oregon to Missouri to Tennessee from pursuing the systems.

"I was asked by a colleague if our schools will have to become fortresses to keep our kids safe. And I told them yes, if that's what it takes. I don't care if we have to park a tank outside a school," Tennessee's Republican House majority leader William Lamberth said.

While Democratic state lawmakers have called for tighter gun laws as a way to stem school shootings, many are now also supporting the school emergency measures that have largely been touted by Republicans.

In Oregon, where Democrats control the Legislature, a bill that would require schools to send electronic notifications to parents as soon as possible after a safety threat occurs passed the state House unanimously this week. Two Democratic lawmakers are the chief sponsors of another bill that would require all public school classrooms to have panic alert devices that would contact law enforcement or emergency services when activated.

If passed, the panic alert bill would make Oregon the fourth state — along with Republican-led Florida and Democratic-led New Jersey and New York — to enact such a law. Several other states are considering similar legislation.

"If there's anything we know, it's that during an emergency, time equals life," said one of the Oregon bill's chief sponsors, Democratic state Representative Emerson Levy.

Some school districts aren't waiting for legislation to implement new security measures such as panic devices.

Las Vegas's Clark County School District, among the 10 largest districts nationwide, is now using a system involving badges called CrisisAlert. The badges can be worn around the neck and pressed to call for help or trigger a schoolwide lockdown.

Olathe Public Schools in suburban Kansas City, the second-largest district in the state, also adopted CrisisAlert. The district has yet to use it to respond to an active shooter situation, according to Jim McMullen, who oversees the district's Safety Services Department and also serves as assistant superintendent of middle school education. But he said school personnel use the badge every day for things ranging from student fights to medical emergencies.

"Earlier today we used it when we had a student who was unconscious. The staff member, instead of leaving the kid to go call for help, was able to just hit their button three times and had a lot of assistance real quickly," he said on Thursday.

Missing Fla. toddler killed by alligator

The body of a 2-year-old boy was discovered in the jaws of an alligator in a tragic end to a search for the toddler after his mother was found stabbed to death, according to authorities in St. Petersburg, Fla.

The boy's father, Thomas Mosley, 21, was booked into Pinellas County jail Friday on two counts of first-degree murder, according to police, who did not release details about a motive.

Mosley's son, Taylen, had been missing since Thursday, after his mother, Pashun Jeffery, 20, was found dead in her apartment around 2:30 p.m., police said. An Amber Alert was issued for the toddler.

An investigation led police officers to Dell Holmes Park, where they found an alligator with something in its mouth, St. Petersburg Police Chief Anthony Holloway said at a news conference Friday night.

Detectives shot and killed the alligator. It dropped what was in its mouth, which was later identified as Taylen's body, Holloway said.

"We didn't want to find him this way," Holloway said. "But at least we can bring some closure to that family."

The boy's cause of death has yet to be released.

Holloway said Jeffery was stabbed multiple times at the Lincoln Shores apartment complex, about 13 miles north of Dell Holmes Park.

Mosley had gone to a hospital Friday with cuts on his hands and arms, Holloway said. He was refusing to speak with detectives, Holloway said. It was unclear if Mosley had a lawyer.

30-year-old sex abuse case against former Alaska attorney general thrown out

ANCHORAGE — A judge dismissed a sex abuse case against former acting Alaska attorney general Clyde "Ed" Sniffen, citing the statute of limitations in place when the alleged abuse happened more than 30 years ago.

The case, thrown out on Friday, involved allegations that Sniffen, 58, sexually abused a then-17-year-old student in 1991, when he was 27 and the alleged victim's coach of her high school's mock trial competition team in Anchorage. Sniffen had pleaded not guilty.

Alaska does not currently have a statute of limitations in place for sexual abuse of minors. However, Superior Court Judge Peter Ramgren said that in 1991 there was a five-year limit on such charges. He said that changes made to the statute of limitations by state lawmakers for certain crimes in 1992 and 2001 did not apply to Sniffen's case, siding with the defendant's lawyer.

US man who joined ISIS gets 20 years

MIAMI — A US citizen who moved his family to Syria to join the Islamic State terrorist group has been sentenced to 20 years in federal prison.

Emraan Ali, 55, a US citizen born in Trinidad and Tobago, was sentenced Tuesday in Miami federal court, according to court records. He pleaded guilty in November to conspiring to provide material support to a foreign terrorist organization.

According to court records, Ali moved his family from Trinidad and Tobago to Brazil, then to Turkey, and eventually to Syria in March 2015. He falsely told his children that they were going on vacation but actually intended to join the terrorist group, prosecutors said.

After arriving in Syria, Ali underwent Islamic State religious and military training with other English speakers, officials said. The training included instruction on the operation of various automatic weapons.

Ali was eventually discharged from combat duty and worked in residential construction for the group in its de facto capital of Raqqa, investigators said.

Chicago man's murder conviction tossed

CHICAGO — A state appeals court has ordered a new trial for the man accused of gunning down a Chicago honor student days after she had performed at Barack Obama's 2013 presidential inauguration.

Micheail Ward was 18 when he confessed to the slaying.

Micheail Ward was found guilty in connection with the death of 15-year-old Hadiya Pendleton and sentenced to 84 years in prison in 2019. The Chicago Sun-Times reported Friday that the 1st District Appellate Court ruled that detectives improperly extracted a confession from Ward after he invoked his right to remain silent at least three times during a 12-hour interrogation.

The appellate court said that Ward's statements were inadmissible and should have been suppressed.

It was unclear whether prosecutors would retry Ward. A spokesperson for Cook County State's Attorney Kim Foxx said the office was reviewing the matter.

Novice politician wins Montenegro presidency in lopsided contest

PODGORICA, Montenegro — Economy specialist and political novice Jakov Milatovic won the presidential runoff election in Montenegro on Sunday, defeating the pro-Western incumbent who has been in power for more than three decades in Montenegro, the candidates and polls said Sunday.

Milatovic, who is backed by Montenegro's governing majority, won around 60 percent of the vote, while Milo Djukanovic won around 40 percent, according to figures released by the usually reliable Center for Monitoring and Research and based on vote sample.

In a victory speech, Milatovic called the moment "historic" and promised to help lead Montenegro into the European Union during his five-year term in office.

"Tonight is the night that we waited for the past 30 years," said Milatovic, blasting Djukanovic as the "last dictator in Europe."

"We want to deal with issues that are of vital importance: the rule of law, economy and European integration," Milatovic said. "We are leaving the past behind and making a decisive step into the future. This is a historic day for us."

Israel to form a national guard

TEL AVIV — Israel's government on Sunday greenlit the formation of a national guard, handing a victory to the minister who proposed the force and drawing condemnation from security officials who warned it could destabilize the country.

The office of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said the national guard will deal with national emergency situations and referred to the internecine violence that accompanied Israel's military incursion in Gaza in 2021.

That period saw particularly violent clashes between Palestinian and Jewish citizens of Israel in mixed cities across the country. It also helped give rise to the career of national security minister Itamar Ben Gvir.

Netanyahu endorsed Ben Gvir's national guard proposal last week, in exchange for the minister's support amid a national crisis over plans to restructure Israel's judiciary. Ben Gvir, a member of Netanyahu's coalition, backed the prime minister's decision to freeze the judicial reform package.

Recuperating pope celebrates Palm Sunday

VATICAN CITY — Pope Francis, who was discharged from a three-day hospital stay on Saturday, seemed on the mend on Sunday as he addressed tens of thousands of faithful gathered in St. Peter's Square for Palm Sunday Mass, allaying concerns about his health.

Francis, 86, arrived at the crowded square in an open-topped jeep, which drove along a corridor lined with thousands of people, many waving palm fronds over their heads, and up a ramp to the top of the basilica's steps. He walked to the altar unassisted. Because of knee problems and recurrent sciatica, he often uses a cane or a wheelchair.

Francis delivered the homily — in which he urged the world to care for those who are abandoned — the Angelus prayer, and a blessing to the estimated 60,000 people in the crowd. And he thanked attendees for their "participation, and also for your prayers, which intensified during these past days."

Finland prime minister appears out as center-right party claims election win

HELSINKI — Finland Prime Minister Sanna Marin appeared to have lost her bid for a second term on Sunday, with her party headed for defeat by two conservative opponents in a race for control of parliament.

The center-right National Coalition Party claimed victory Sunday evening with around 97.7 percent of the votes counted, coming out on top at 20.7 percent. They were followed closely by right-wing populist party The Finns with 20.1 percent, while the Social Democrats garnered 19.9 percent.

With the top three parties each getting around 20 percent of the vote, no party is in position to form a government alone. More than 2,400 candidates from 22 parties were vying for the 200 seats in parliament.

Russian military blogger is killed in cafe bombing

Ukraine denies involvement in St. Petersburg

NEW YORK TIMES

An influential Russian military blogger who called for an escalation of the war in Ukraine was killed when a bomb exploded in a cafe in St. Petersburg, Russia, on Sunday, in what appeared to be one of the most high-profile attacks on a supporter of Moscow's invasion.

The blogger, Maksim Fomin, who was more popularly known as Vladlen Tatarsky, was giving a public talk in the center of Russia's second-largest city when the explosion ripped through Street Food Bar #1 Cafe, the Russian Interior Ministry and investigative authorities said.

Videos posted on social media showed Tatarsky receiving a small statue in his likeness onstage shortly before the explosion. An independent local news outlet, Fontanka, cited a witness as saying the blogger had received the statue as a gift from a woman who introduced herself as a sculptor called Nastya.

Another witness said Tatarsky had asked the woman to bring the statue to him, after she said she had been told she could not take it inside because of bombing fears, according to the Russian tabloid Komsomolskaya Pravda. About 100 people had gathered at the cafe to listen to him speak about his experience as a military blogger, Fontanka said.

At least 25 other people were injured in the explosion, with 19 of them hospitalized, according to the city's governor, Aleksandr Beglov.

Tatarsky represented a radical wing of proinvasion bloggers and activists who backed Moscow's war but also criticized what they saw as the flaws in the Russian army. His death was the most high-profile attack on a prominent war supporter inside Russia since August, when a car bomb killed Daria Dugina, the daughter of an ultranationalist Russian supporter of President Vladimir Putin's.

US intelligence officials said at the time they believed the attack had been authorized by parts of the Ukrainian government, which denied any involvement.

Ukraine did not immediately comment on Sunday's bombing. But Mihailo Podolyak, an adviser to Ukrainian President Volodymyr Zelensky, suggested that the attack was a sign of internal fractures in Russian society, in line with Ukraine's usual description of acts of sabotage in Russia since the war began.

Podolyak wrote on Twitter: "Spiders are eating each other in a jar. Question of when domestic terrorism would become an instrument of internal political fight was a matter of time."

Russian officials pointed the finger at the government in Kyiv, without directly accusing Ukraine of killing the blogger. Russia's Foreign Ministry said in a statement that Tatarsky's work had "caused hatred" of the Ukrainian government.

Sergei Neverov, deputy speaker of the Russian parliament, said, "It is clear to everyone who is behind it."

He wrote on the Telegram messaging app that the attack had been an attempt to terrorize Russian society, adding that it destroyed any prospect of a peace deal.

"We only saw one more proof that there's no one to talk to Kyiv," Neverov said.

Some of Tatarsky's peers immediately called for an escalation of strikes against Ukraine to avenge the attack.

"Are we going to wait until GUR carry out a terror attack in the Kremlin?" wrote another military blogger who posts under the name Notes of Veteran, using the acronym for Ukraine's military intelligence. "Perhaps only then will there be strikes against centers of decision-making in Kyiv."

A native of eastern Ukraine, Tatarsky, 40, obtained Russian citizenship in 2021. His survivors include his wife, Ksenia. Local news outlets said he also had a son from a first marriage.

Tatarsky took the side of the Russian proxy forces when they occupied the city of Donetsk in 2014. Since Russia's full-scale invasion, he had advocated waging a total war against Ukraine and its population and called for the elimination of the Ukrainian state. He also denounced Russian activists and cultural figures who opposed the war.

Blinken urges Moscow to free two

Names Whelan, Gershkovich in a rare phone call

By Eric Tucker and Matthew Lee
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State Antony Blinken urged his Russian counterpart, in a rare phone call between the diplomats since the Ukraine war, to immediately release a Wall Street Journal reporter who was detained last week as well as another imprisoned American, Paul Whelan, the State Department said Sunday.

In the call with Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov, Blinken conveyed "grave concern" over the Kremlin's detention of journalist Evan Gershkovich on espionage allegations, according to a State Department summary of the call. Blinken called for his immediate release.

Blinken also sought the immediate release of Whelan, whom the statement said was wrongfully detained. US officials said they were considering a similar determination for Gershkovich that could be made at any time. Should that happen, his case would be largely transferred to the office of the US Special Presidential for Hostage Affairs.

Whelan, a Michigan corporate security executive, has been imprisoned in Russia since December 2018 on espionage charges that his family and the US government have said are baseless. He is serving a 16-year sentence.

Blinken and Lavrov also discussed "the importance of creating an environment that permits diplomatic missions to carry out their work," according to the State Department.

The FSB, Russia's top security agency and successor to the KGB, said Gershkovich was collecting information on an enterprise of the military-industrial complex. Russian authorities detained him last week, the first time a US correspondent has been held on spying accusations since the Cold War.

Evan Gershkovich is an American journalist.

In its summary of the call, Russia's foreign ministry said Lavrov "drew Blinken's attention to the need to respect the decisions of the Russian authorities" about Gershkovich, whom Moscow claims, without evidence, "was caught red-handed."

The Journal has adamantly denied the allegations and demanded his release. US officials have also called on Russia to let him go, with President Biden telling reporters on Friday that his message to the country was "let him go."

The Kremlin said Lavrov also told Blinken it was unacceptable for US officials and Western news media to continue "whipping up excitement" and politicizing the journalist's detention. "His further fate will be determined by the court."

The State Department described the detention of Gershkovich as unacceptable.

Emma Tucker, the newspaper's editor in chief, said it was "gratifying" and "reassuring" to learn of Blinken's call because it shows the US government is taking the case "right up to the top." The Journal has been unable to get messages to the reporter or learn any official information about him, she told CBS' "Face the Nation."

US consular officials have requested a visit with Gershkovich but no announcement of such access has been made. Officials said they were hopeful consular access could be arranged in the coming week but could not speak to when that might happen.

Tucker said the newspaper is hopeful a lawyer might be able to meet with Gershkovich this coming week, and in the meantime has been "pressing constantly for reassurance that he's not being mistreated in any way."

Silicon Valley Bank is now a division of First Citizens Bank

The California Department of Financial Protection and Innovation closed Silicon Valley Bank of Santa Clara, CA, on March 10, 2023, and appointed the FDIC as receiver. Afterward, the FDIC transferred all deposits of the former Silicon Valley Bank to Silicon Valley Bridge Bank, N.A., operated by the FDIC. On March 27, 2023, Silicon Valley Bridge Bank, N.A. was closed by the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, and the FDIC was appointed as receiver. First Citizens Bank then entered into an agreement with the FDIC to purchase out of FDIC receivership substantially all loans and certain other assets and assume all customer deposits and certain other liabilities of Silicon Valley Bridge Bank.

SVB clients should bank as they normally do at their current Silicon Valley Bank branch. They can continue to use their checks and cards and will still have online access to their accounts. Customer deposits are safe, accessible and still protected by FDIC insurance up to applicable limits. First Citizens Bank operates branches in 23 states. Founded in 1898, First Citizens Bank is a wholly owned subsidiary of First Citizens BancShares, Inc., which has more than $219 billion in assets.

Russian shelling kills civilians as assault stalls

Offensive in east fails to make much progress

By Matthew Mpoke Bigg, Maria Varenikova, and Ivan Nechepurenko
NEW YORK TIMES

Russian shelling blasted apartment blocks, homes, and a preschool in eastern Ukraine on Sunday, killing six civilians, even as evidence mounted that Moscow has failed to make much progress in its campaign to seize the whole of the region.

For months, the fighting in the Donbas, an industrial and agricultural region close to the Russian border, has been the scene of grinding battles that have sapped the strength of both armies.

But while Russia has struggled to gain territory against Ukraine's military, it has regularly launched attacks on civilians. The latest such attack involved the shelling of a town around 15 miles west of the front line, Kostyantynivka, that killed three men and three women and wounded 11 others, according to President Volodymyr Zelensky of Ukraine.

The attack damaged numerous apartment buildings, spraying wet earth and shrapnel. Soldiers helped civilians clear away rubble and cover broken windows with plywood. Workers found the body of one of the victims, an elderly man, next to a huge crater in his vegetable garden.

The civilian toll in Donbas, which is made up of parts of the Donetsk and Luhansk regions, has been enormous. According to United Nations data, more than half of the roughly 18,000 civilians killed in Ukraine since Russia launched its full-scale offensive in February 2022 have died in those two regions.

But the Kremlin's main objective in the east is conquest, and Russian forces have been stymied by the Ukrainian defenders. Russia's military bloggers and like-minded activists have in recent weeks lamented the lack of progress from the winter campaign. Russia has not secured victory in the city of Bakhmut, or in the towns of Avdiivka, Vuhledar, Lyman, or Marinka.

"The winter campaign in the Donbas is over," said Igor Girkin, a former Russian intelligence officer who led a military intervention in eastern Ukraine and now blogs about military affairs. "We can say that the winter campaign ended unsuccessfully." The comments by Girkin, who uses the nickname Strelkov, were echoed by others in Russia who have ties to the military and have at times been critical of the Kremlin's approach to the war.

Russia's winter offensive followed a series of battlefield setbacks last fall. In the early days of the invasion, Ukraine was also successful in fending off the toppling of its government in Kyiv.

Moscow has had more success weathering the diplomatic isolation imposed by Ukraine's Western allies, aimed at punishing the Kremlin and eroding its ability to wage the war. For instance, China's leader, Xi Jinping, made a three-day state visit to Moscow last month.

In a further example of Moscow's continued global prominence, Russia assumed the rotating presidency of the UN Security Council on Saturday, a prestigious if largely ceremonial post it will give up next month.

Russia's assumption of the post — just two weeks after the International Criminal Court issued an arrest warrant for President Vladimir Putin of Russia on accusations of war crimes — elicited a furious response from Zelensky, who called it "obviously absurd and destructive."

He attacked not just Moscow but the structure of a system that allows Russia, a permanent member of the Security Council, to take the UN leadership post even as it prosecutes a war condemned by much of the world, saying it "proves the complete bankruptcy of such institutions."

Even as Russia exerts its influence on the international stage, it has paid dearly on the battlefield. Ukraine has suffered high casualties, too, but some military experts say those faced by Russia have been far higher.

A Ukrainian military specialist, Oleksiy Melnyk, said that two factors in particular had served to impede Russia's campaign this year. The first was the battle for Vuhledar in Donetsk, in which elite Russian forces sustained severe losses, including tanks and other armored vehicles. The second was Ukraine's decision not to abandon Bakhmut as Russia advanced around the city, including capturing the nearby town of Soledar.

"The Russian offensive campaign is about to end," Melnyk said in an interview. "It seems they will not try a major offensive any time soon."

But he cautioned that the Kremlin appeared to be laying plans for a protracted conflict, aiming to drain Ukraine's fighting strength over time and waiting for international support for the government in Kyiv to wane.

Many military experts in the United States and elsewhere have started to measure the modest gains of Russia's offensive against what they expect to be a Ukrainian counteroffensive in the coming weeks. Some analysts, however, noted that there would be little disappointment within Russia, because the campaign had not been widely discussed by state media.

Menlyk, the Ukrainian military specialist, said the counteroffensive could come in the next few weeks, "once the ground becomes suitable for tanks to move across open fields."

Russian advocate accused of war crimes over Ukrainian children

By Valerie Hopkins
NEW YORK TIMES

MOSCOW — As children gathered at a holiday camp outside Moscow, they were greeted by a female performer in a kokoshnik, a traditional tiara, who extended the customary Russian greeting of a loaf of bread and salt.

The children were not from Russia. They were Ukrainian children brought to the camp from Russian-occupied areas of Ukraine.

"We welcome you like this," said Maria Lvova-Belova, Russia's commissioner for children's rights, who was at the event, "because now you are ours."

Many of the children Lvova-Belova has brought from Ukraine have indeed become Russian, at least by passport, thanks to a decree she asked President Vladimir Putin to sign last year to streamline the adoption of Ukrainian children.

She has used that authority to transfer to Russia what Ukraine says are as many as 16,000 children. Some of those children have described a wrenching process of coercion, deception, and force, with many placed in homes to become Russian citizens and subjected to reeducation.

And the International Criminal Court has branded her actions a war crime. When it issued arrest warrants last month related to the Ukrainian invasion, it named only two Russians: Putin and Lvova-Belova.

She is reviled in Ukraine, where she is labeled a war criminal, and the United States and Britain imposed sanctions on her in 2022, but at home, Lvova-Belova is portrayed as the archetype of the woman revered in Putin's Russia: a conservative, deeply religious mother to a large brood — as well as a dedicated advocate of the rights of children and people with disabilities.

In the Kremlin's telling, she is far from a war criminal, instead leading a humanitarian evacuation of only around 2,000 orphans and other children who have been abandoned. The Russian propaganda machine notwithstanding, there is little doubt that she is a mother and guardian to many children: At the time of her appointment in October 2021, she told Putin that she had nine children, five biological and four adopted, while fostering 13 more. Now, her official biography lists her as the mother of 10 children, as she adopted a teenage boy from Mariupol, Ukraine, over the summer.

Lvova-Belova, 38, grew up in Penza, Russia, a city of about 500,000 about 400 miles southeast of Moscow. She met her husband, Pavel Kogelman, when she was a teenager singing in a church choir. In high school, she studied conducting, and she later gave guitar lessons.

For more than a decade, Lvova-Belova threw herself into helping disadvantaged children and disabled people. One of her first public projects was to provide care for babies who had been abandoned by their parents.

In 2008, already the mother of two children, she cofounded an organization called Blagovest that helped orphans adapt socially. Her cofounder, Anna Kuznetsova, became something of a trailblazer for Lvova-Belova, first establishing a name for herself in the social services field and then branching into politics.

Both women became well known in the city for their efforts, said Oleg Sharipkov, executive director of the Penza Civil Union Foundation. After establishing Blagovest, the two women went their separate ways as partners, with Lvova-Belova focusing on disabilities and Kuznetsova becoming active in the antiabortion movement, but they remained close friends.

MIKHAIL METZEL VIA GETTY IMAGES

Maria Lvova-Belova is accused of extracting children for adoption.

"They had a good reputation in the community. They really, really, did some good things," Sharipkov said. And then there was a "turning point," he said, when both women realized that they could raise substantial funds from the regional and federal governments: "Both began to cuddle up hard to power."

Lvova-Belova met with Putin for the first time March 9, 2022, in a session that was videotaped and made public. It had been less than two weeks since Russian troops' full-scale invasion of Ukraine, but she told the president that 1,090 orphans had already arrived.

"Of course, Russians have big hearts and are already queuing up to take care of these children. What do you think?" she asked, adding that only those who had Russian documents could settle permanently into families.

There were "legal caveats" to be addressed before non-Russian children could be adopted, she told Putin, who quickly brushed aside such concerns.

In May, Putin issued a decree that removed the obstacles to giving the children Russian passports.

Having been given her marching orders, Lvova-Belova began traveling to the Russian-occupied areas of Ukraine, visiting orphanages, bringing supplies, and often bringing children back with her.

But Lvova-Belova stands accused of serious violations of international law, such as extracting children from orphanages and hospitals in Russian-occupied areas of Ukraine even though many had relatives who would have taken them in.

Harris finds new connections in Africa as a historic figure

VP appearances were treated like a homecoming

By Chris Megerian
ASSOCIATED PRESS

LUSAKA, Zambia — Vice President Kamala Harris may have traveled halfway around the world to reach this corner of Africa, but she was welcomed as a "daughter of our own country" when she sat down with Zambia's leader.

The visit, President Hakainde Hichilema said, was "like a homecoming."

It was a reference to a childhood trip to Zambia when Harris's grandfather worked here, but she heard similar refrains throughout her weeklong trip to Africa that ended Saturday.

In Ghana, President Nana Akufo-Addo told Harris, "you're welcome home." In Tanzania, a sign in Swahili told Harris to "feel at home."

The greetings were a reflection of the enduring connections between the African diaspora in the United States and Africans themselves, something that America's first Black vice president fostered during her trip. Although her historic status has led to extreme scrutiny and extraordinary expectations in Washington, it was a source of excitement over the past week.

"She is the ambassador we need at the moment," said Tracy Sharpley-Whiting, who chairs African American and Diaspora Studies at Vanderbilt University. "That's a joyous thing."

Harris's background did not spare her from difficult conversations about US foreign policy, and she was pressed in Africa about visas, private investment, and funding to deal with climate change. There's also skepticism over whether the United States will follow through with its commitments and over its attempts to rival China's own influence in Africa.

But at every stop, Harris was warmly embraced.

"Kamala Harris! Kamala Harris!" young girls shouted on the tarmac when she landed in Lusaka on Friday. She approached them with her hand on her chest in gratitude. "The VP is here! The VP is here!"

The last week produced none of the unfortunate viral moments that dogged Harris on previous foreign trips, such as when she laughed off a question about visiting the US border with Mexico or when she said the US had an "alliance with the Republic of North Korea."

But anyone tuning in would have seen Harris hanging out with actor Idris Elba and actor-singer Sheryl Lee Ralph at a recording studio in Accra, Ghana's capital, or collecting business cards from young entrepreneurs in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania, or walking through rows of peppers at a farm outside of Lusaka. Sometimes she felt comfortable enough to discard her prepared remarks, a rarity for a politician who sticks closely to the script in Washington.

Harris's itinerary was aimed at portraying it as young, dynamic, innovative — and primed for American business opportunities, particularly with leaders from the diaspora.

The most glamorous event was a state banquet at the Ghanaian presidential palace known as the Jubilee House, where Black American celebrities, business people, and civil rights activists gathered.

In her toast, Harris paid tribute to attendees who "represent the glorious beauty of the African diaspora," and she spoke about "our shared destiny."

Marc Morial, president of the National Urban League, said there was a "festive and family" atmosphere to be there with the first Black vice president in US history.

"It's a moment of pride," he said. "And it's a moment of opportunity."

The trip could be Harris's last foray overseas before the 2024 campaign begins in earnest. President Biden is expected to announce his reelection run, and Harris will be a prime target for Republican attacks.

Ex-Ark. governor announces presidential bid

Asa Hutchinson, the former governor of Arkansas, joined the race for the Republican nomination for president Sunday, banking that in a crowded field, enough GOP voters will be searching for an outspoken critic of Donald Trump to lift his dark-horse candidacy.

POLITICAL NOTEBOOK

"What struck me as I was in Orange County, Calif., and as I was in Iowa for three days this week, was that the Trump factor really didn't come up," he said in an interview Sunday, after he announced his candidacy on ABC's "This Week." The voters, he said, "are talking about things that matter to them, which is the economy, which is the fentanyl crisis that we have, and the relationship and leadership of America on the world stage."

Hutchinson has made several trips to Iowa, where he has tested out what he has called a message of "consistent conservatism" to Republican voters who have flocked to Trump in the past two elections. Recent polling has shown Trump's lead among primary voters surging as his legal peril has grown. The former president is expected to be arraigned Tuesday in Manhattan on charges that he falsified business records and violated New York campaign finance law to cover up hush-money payments to a pornographic film actress in the final days of the 2016 election.

With several other cases pending, Hutchinson appears to be betting that external forces will trip up Trump's third run for the White House. Other anti-Trump Republicans, such as former Maryland governor Larry Hogan, have declined to run. And the Republicans who have jumped in or are preparing to have carefully avoided direct criticism of the front-runner.

Hutchinson is not a moderate Republican. He signed a ban on abortion that makes no exceptions for pregnancies that result from rape or incest, although he expressed some reservations. He has pressed for the repeal of the Affordable Care Act. And he led a task force convened by the National Rifle Association after the massacre of schoolchildren at Sandy Hook Elementary School in 2012 to come up with a response to blunt the push for gun control.

SUNDAY MASS — President Biden waved to onlookers as he departed Saint Anthony of Padua Roman Catholic Church in Wilmington, Del., on Sunday.

Biden and 2024 campaign: Waiting on big decisions

WASHINGTON — President Biden has all but announced he's running for reelection, but key questions about the 2024 campaign are unresolved: Who will manage it? Where will it be based? When will he finally make it official?

Advisers have long said he planned to wait until after March, when the year's first fund-raising period wraps up. That was an effort to help manage expectations because many donors who gave generously to Democratic causes during last fall's elections were looking for a break.

But an announcement isn't imminent even now, aides insist, and probably won't come until at least after Biden returns from an expected trip to Ireland in mid-April.

Working on his own timeline could counter Biden's low approval ratings and questions about his age — the 80-year-old would turn 86 before the end of a second term. It also means Biden won't be hurried by pressure from former president Donald Trump, who's already announced his 2024 campaign, or other top Republicans who may enter the race, including Florida Governor Ron DeSantis or former vice president Mike Pence.

"He's earned the luxury of making the timetable," said Brad Bannon, a Democratic strategist in Washington. "The longer he can keep this thing focused on his duties in the White House, and less about the campaign back-and-forth, the better off he's going to be."

That said, Biden aides are mindful that Trump has been indicted for his role in the payment of hush money to a porn actor, and they say Biden will look to time his announcement to a point when he won't share the political spotlight with the man he beat in the 2020 election.

Biden's inner political circle is ready to begin executing on the campaign's strategy from Day One and sees no drawbacks to the president taking his time. Biden faces no significant Democratic challenger for the nomination. The self-help guru Marianne Williamson is the sole contender at this point in the primary race.

Costly court race will decide future of abortion in Wis.

ELKHART LAKE, Wis. — Tuesday's election for a seat on the Wisconsin Supreme Court, the most expensive judicial race in US history, has turned into a caustic, ideological brawl that will determine whether liberals or conservatives control the branch of government that will soon decide the fate of the state's abortion ban.

The candidates, political parties, and ideological groups have spent more than $30 million on the race, obliterating the record for a judicial election that was established two decades ago in Illinois. Officially nonpartisan, races for the Wisconsin Supreme Court lost their apolitical sheen long ago and the candidates this year are campaigning more like members of Congress than jurists. That's particularly true for the liberal candidate, Milwaukee County Judge Janet Protasiewicz, who has touted her support for access to abortion and decried the state's election maps, which the court could take up, as "rigged."

Her conservative opponent, former state Supreme Court justice Daniel Kelly, has characterized Protasiewicz as a politician and questioned her ability to remain impartial on hot-button cases. He has nonetheless made his own political views clear over the years in blog posts critical of abortion, same-sex marriage, and Social Security.

The campaign has been nasty. At their only debate, Kelly repeatedly labeled Protasiewicz a liar and Protasiewicz called Kelly a "true threat to our democracy" because he advised the state Republican Party chairman on a plan in 2020 to have GOP officials sign paperwork claiming to be the state's presidential electors even though Donald Trump lost the state.

Conservatives have controlled the court for a decade and a half and in recent years have had the final say on important issues in a state that has a Democratic governor and a Republican-dominated legislature. If liberals gain a one-vote majority on the court, they are expected to redraw the state's legislative districts, watering down Republicans' strength in the statehouse.

Trump claims judge 'hates' him; his lawyer disagrees

Former president Donald Trump's attorney Joe Tacopina said Sunday he doesn't believe the judge who oversaw Trump's indictment is biased, contradicting days of Trump's attacks in which he declared that the judge "HATES ME."

On Friday, the former president claimed on his Truth Social account that Juan Merchan, the New York Supreme Court justice who's overseeing the criminal proceedings, had treated Trump's company "VICIOUSLY" in a tax fraud case that wrapped up in January and had "railroaded" a former executive for the Trump Organization, Allen Weisselberg, into pleading guilty.

But Tacopina, speaking on Sunday to George Stephanopoulos on ABC News's "This Week," waved off the criticism. "Do I think the judge is biased? Of course not," Tacopina said. "How could I subscribe to that when I've had no interactions with the judge that would lead me to believe he's biased?"

Justice Dept. focuses on possible obstruction by Trump

More evidence reportedly found at Mar-a-Lago

By Devlin Barrett, Josh Dawsey, and Perry Stein
THE WASHINGTON POST

Justice Department and FBI investigators have amassed fresh evidence pointing to possible obstruction by former President Donald Trump in the investigation into top-secret documents found at his Mar-a-Lago home, according to people familiar with the matter.

The additional evidence comes as investigators have used e-mails and text messages from a former Trump aide to help understand key moments last year, said the people, who like others interviewed for this article spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss an ongoing criminal investigation.

The new details highlight the degree to which special counsel Jack Smith's investigation into the potential mishandling of hundreds of classified national security papers at Trump's Florida home and private club has come to focus on the obstruction elements of the case: whether the former president took or directed actions to impede government efforts to collect all the sensitive records.

The emphasis on obstruction marks a key distinction so far between the Mar-a-Lago investigation and a separate Justice Department probe into how a much smaller number of classified documents ended up in an insecure office of President Biden's, as well as his Delaware home. The Trump investigation is much further along than the Biden probe. Biden's lawyers say they have quickly handed over all classified documents found in Biden's possession.

The Trump investigation team has spent much of its time focusing on events that happened after Trump's advisers received a subpoena in May demanding the return of all documents with classified markings, the people familiar with the matter said. Smith is trying to determine if Trump or others mishandled national security documents, and if there is enough evidence to ask a grand jury to charge him with obstructing the investigation.

The Mar-a-Lago investigation is one of four separate criminal probes involving Trump, who is campaigning for another term in the White House. Trump has been indicted by a New York grand jury that heard evidence about money paid to adult-film actress Stormy Daniels during his 2016 presidential campaign. He is also being investigated by the Justice Department and a state prosecutor in Georgia over efforts to block Joe Biden's victory in the 2020 election.

Trump spokesman Steven Cheung said in a written statement: "The witch-hunts against President Trump have no basis in facts or law. The deranged special counsel and the DoJ have now resorted to prosecutorial misconduct by illegally leaking information to corrupt the legal process and weaponize the justice system in order to manipulate public opinion and conduct election interference, because they are clearly losing all across the board."

The statement went on to point to the Biden classified documents probe, as well as the investigation of Hillary Clinton's use of a private e-mail server when she was secretary of state, suggesting that conduct there was worse than anything that happened at Mar-a-Lago.

In the classified documents case, federal investigators have gathered new and significant evidence that after the subpoena was delivered, Trump looked through the contents of some of the boxes of documents in his home, apparently out of a desire to keep certain things in his possession, the people familiar with the investigation said.

Investigators now suspect, based on witness statements, security camera footage, and other documentary evidence, that boxes including classified material were moved from a Mar-a-Lago storage area after the subpoena was served, and that Trump personally examined at least some of those boxes, these people said. While Trump's team returned some documents with classified markings in response to the subpoena, a later FBI search found more than 100 additional classified items that had not been turned over.

Court papers filed seeking judicial authorization for the FBI to conduct the search of Trump's home show agents believed that "evidence of obstruction will be found at the premises."

The city of Trump's dreams may deliver his comeuppance

New York put him on map, but he's fallen out of favor

By Matt Sedensky
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — His name has been plastered on this city's tabloids, bolted to its buildings, and cemented to a special breed of brash New York confidence. Now, with Donald Trump due to return to the place that put him on the map, the city he loved is poised to deliver his comeuppance.

NEWS ANALYSIS

The former president has been rejected by its voters, ostracized by its protesters, and now rebuked by its jurors, and the people of New York have one more thing on which to splash Trump's name: Indictment No. 71543-23.

"He wanted to be in Manhattan. He loved Manhattan. He had a connection to Manhattan," says Barbara Res, a longtime employee of the former president who was a vice president at the Trump Organization. "I don't know that he has accepted it and I don't know that he believes it, but New York turned on him."

None of Trump's romances have lasted longer than his courtship of New York. No place else could match his blend of ostentatious and outlandish. His love of the city going unrequited is Shakespearean enough, but Trump took it a step further, rising to the presidency only to become a hometown antihero.

Trump was born and raised in Queens to a real estate developer father whose projects were largely in Queens and Brooklyn. But the younger Trump ached to cross the East River and make his name in Manhattan. He gained a foothold with his transformation of the rundown Commodore Hotel into a glittering Grand Hyatt and ensured a spotlight on himself by appearing at the side of politicians and celebrities, popping up at Studio 54 and other hot spots and coaxing near-constant media coverage.

By the greed-is-good 1980s, he was a New York fixture. And in a city that prides itself as the center of the world, Trump saw himself as king.

"Trump grew up with a great deal of resentment toward others who he thought had more fame, wealth, or popularity," says David Greenberg, a Rutgers University professor who wrote "Republic of Spin: An Inside History of the American Presidency." "Making it in Manhattan — building Trump Tower and becoming a fixture of the Manhattan social scene in the 1980s — meant a lot to him."

The feeling was never truly mutual, though. Trump left a trail of unpaid bills, jilted workers, and everyday New Yorkers who saw through his shameless self-promotion.

He may have been a singular character, but in a city of 8 million stories, his was just another one. So, for years, Trump's life here continued as the city raced on around him. Marriages came and went. Skyscrapers rose. Bankruptcies were filed. Trump flickered in and out of fame's upper echelon.

He may never have been a common New Yorker, but for many he remained a benign, if outsized, presence.

That began changing with years of bizarre, racially fueled lies about Barack Obama's birthplace, and by the time he descended the golden escalator at Trump Tower on June 16, 2015, to announce his presidential bid, many in his hometown had little patience for the vitriol he spewed.

Rockefeller Center played host to a weekly "Saturday Night Live" that made him a mockery, and at a Waldorf-Astoria gala, he elicited groans. In vast swaths of the city, distaste for Trump turned to hatred.

BRYAN WOOLSTON/ASSOCIATED PRESS

Protesters gathered outside Trump Tower in New York on Friday.

Even among Republicans, many saw him as believable as a Gucci bag on Canal Street. Trump won the state's Republican primary, but couldn't convince GOP voters in Manhattan.

"He's no longer just this TV show charlatan. People see this man is actually going to lead the country and the world in the wrong direction," says Christina Greer, a political scientist at Fordham University.

On election night 2016, tears flowed at the Javits Center, where Hillary Clinton's victory party never materialized, while giddy supporters of Trump reveled in his surprise win across town in a Hilton ballroom. New Yorkers' rebuke of their native son meant nothing. His face was projected unto the face of the Empire State Building as locals digested the fact that he would be president.

In the days that followed, a curious parade of politicians and celebrities journeyed to Trump Tower to meet the president-elect and, for weeks after, predictions about his presidency were rampant.

Among the musings of observers was speculation of a commuter president shuttling between New York and Washington. When word emerged that his wife and young son wouldn't immediately move to the White House, it gave credence to the idea that Trump could never fully part with the city that made him.

But Trump continued being Trump, his presidency gave way to one controversy and broken norm after another, and New York become a capital of the resistance, giving birth to persistent mass protests. The city of his dreams was no longer a place he could call home.

"New York has gone to hell," he said as Election Day 2020 neared.

When the ballots were counted, Manhattan had seven times as many supporters of Joe Biden than those for Trump, and this time the Electoral College followed. When Trump's presidency ended and he left Washington after the violent insurrection he incited, it was clear New York would be inhospitable. Like droves of New Yorkers before him, he retired to Florida.

When he returns north now, he spends most of his time at his club in Bedminster, N.J. On his first return to Manhattan after leaving office, the New York Post reported a single person waited outside Trump Tower to catch a glimpse. Even protesters couldn't be bothered with him.

His rebuke came from New Yorkers taking part in a rite-of-passage for city dwellers, jury duty, and if it fit the mold of prior grand juries, it brought together a quintessential Manhattan cross-section.

With word of Trump's indictment now out, the story of his deteriorating romance with New York is gaining a sense of finality. Even the Post, part of the Rupert Murdoch media empire that helped Trump win the White House to begin with, has abandoned him. The paper that once documented his affair with a screaming "Best Sex I've Ever Had" headline beside Trump's smirking face, last week called him "deranged" on a front page on which he was branded "Bat Hit Crazy" in huge letters.

Trump once bragged he could shoot someone in the middle of Fifth Avenue and remain popular. Today, he could hand out fifties in New York and still not win the support of most locals.

He has dismissed the grand jury's actions as a "scam" and a "persecution" and denied he did anything wrong. Democrats, he says, are lying and cheating to hurt his campaign to return to the White House.

Outside the courthouse that awaits him, the spectacle has largely been confined to the hordes of media. Among the few regular New Yorkers to make the trip there was Marni Halasa, who showed up in a leopard print leotard, cat ears, and wads of fake bills strung into a "hush money" boa. She stood alone outside Friday to celebrate the indictment of one of her city's most famous sons.

"New Yorkers are here in spirit," she says, "and I feel like I'm representing most of them."

▶TRUMP

At the same time, Trump's legal team was speaking out against the indictment, which came as a result of a grand jury vote in Manhattan on Thursday. In an interview Sunday on "This Week with George Stephanopoulos" on ABC, Joe Tacopina, a lawyer for Trump, called the looming charges "a political persecution" and "a complete abuse of power" that the former president was ready to fight.

"He's a tough guy," Tacopina said, adding that he was looking forward "to moving this thing along as quickly as possible to exonerate him."

Trump, 76, is expected to surrender at the office of Manhattan District Attorney Alvin Bragg Tuesday afternoon, before being arraigned in the hulking Manhattan Criminal Courts Building. The arraignment will take place in a 15th-floor courtroom, and Justice Juan M. Merchan, a state Supreme Court judge, will hear the case.

The exact charges have not been unsealed, though they are linked to a payment made during the 2016 election to buy the silence of a porn actress, Stormy Daniels, who says she had a brief sexual relationship with Trump in 2006. Trump denies the affair. Prosecutors are expected to accuse Trump of falsifying business records to hide the nature of the reimbursements to his former fixer, who had paid the hush money to Daniels.

A conviction would probably not mandate a minimum prison sentence nor prevent Trump from running for president. But the indictment has roiled the political landscape in America.

Trump, who has led most polls for the Republican nomination, has attacked the prosecution as a partisan move by Bragg, a Democrat, saying it was aimed at crippling his campaign. His Republicans rivals have largely echoed him. Many Democrats have praised the indictment as proof that no one is above the law.

The case against Trump, which his lawyers say they plan to take to trial, is likely to be overseen by Merchan, who also handled the case of Allen Weisselberg, the former chief financial executive of the Trump Organization. Weisselberg pleaded guilty to tax fraud charges last year and testified against the company, which was convicted of doling out off-the-books perks to some top executives.

Former president Trump departed Trump International Golf Club in West Palm Beach, Fla., on Sunday.

Trump, who will be fingerprinted and have his photo taken, has sharply criticized Bragg and Merchan and announced that he will return to Florida to give a prime-time address from his Mar-a-Lago compound in Palm Beach on Tuesday night.

Jason Miller, a top aide to Trump, told Newsmax the speech would show "just how fervent he is."

"President Trump is very emboldened; he's very strong; he feels the support from all the people who are backing him," Miller said.

Trump aides and lawyers had been going back and forth over the wisdom of his appearing before reporters after the arraignment. Trump has been catapulted back into the headlines by the criminal charges and he relishes media attention, and while some of his lawyers would have preferred he stay silent, his campaign believes the development has energized his supporters.

Trump's campaign says it has raised more than $5 million and logged more than 16,000 volunteer signups since the indictment, which Trump spokesman Steven Cheung said were "key indicators that Americans from all backgrounds are sick and tired of the weaponization of the justice system against President Trump and his supporters."

As Tuesday's arraignment approached, the Police Department let officers know they may be called in for crowd control, and court officers and Secret Service agents planned routes for getting Trump in and out of the courthouse building on Centre Street without incident. The area was expected to be largely shut down before the arraignment.

Lucien Chalfen, a spokesperson for New York's courts, said Sunday court officers are working with local, state, and federal law enforcement, including the Secret Service, "to ensure security in and around 100 Centre Street and throughout the city's courthouses."

Apart from scheduled trials, all Manhattan criminal court proceedings will be adjourned Tuesday afternoon to reduce foot traffic, Chalfen said.

Trump's supporters have called for demonstrations in a park across the street from the building, as other events ramp up, including a "homecoming" rally planned for Trump Tower on Monday morning.

In interviews Sunday, Tacopina said he would pore over the indictment once he receives it, then devise the next legal steps. He dismissed questions about whether he would ask for a venue change or file a motion to dismiss the case as premature, though it's common for defense attorneys to do both.

"We're way too early to start deciding what motions we're going to file or not file, and we do need to see the indictment and get to work," he told ABC's "This Week." "I mean, look, this is the beginning."

But Tacopina said that most of what will happen Tuesday remains "up in the air," given Trump's unique status as a former president, "other the fact that we will very loudly and proudly say, 'Not guilty.'"

Dividing lines drawn over abortion in Ohio

rights in a country where such things are now decided at the state level. This effort in Ohio, which is spearheaded by Ohioans for Reproductive Freedom and Ohio Physicians for Reproductive Rights, will be the latest test to see just how quickly the landscape is shifting for advocates on both sides of the issue. The language recently cleared a key hurdle in the process, when organizers got an approval from the state ballot board that allowed them to go forward with the signature-gathering phase of the process.

The antiabortion side is looking to match the reproductive rights movement's show of force, launching a coalition of antiabortion groups called Protect Women Ohio to defeat the proposal in November.

On March 15, that group announced a $5 million TV and digital ad buy over a four-week period, kicking off with an ad targeted at parents.

"You're going to get a presidential-level campaign, and we're going to be out there," Michael Hartley, a seasoned Ohio political operative who was hired as Protect Women Ohio's campaign manager, said in an interview in Columbus. "We have soldiers in faith that are going to be out there knocking to defeat this amendment."

The opposing group is only one of the obstacles facing abortion-rights advocates.

The Ohio Supreme Court is considering a suit filed by antiabortion proponents, arguing the Ohio Ballot Board shouldn't have let the measure move forward. There are also efforts in the Republican-dominated state House to raise the bar on the percentage of votes that would be needed to pass a constitutional amendment. Like the abortion-rights proposal, these efforts are focused on accomplishing that through a constitutional amendment. The difference is that rather than being citizen-led like the abortion question, this could end up being put on the ballot by the Legislature.

If one of these proposals succeeded, the public would vote on whether to approve it, and that could take place in August. The vote on the separate abortion initiative at the ballot box would take place in November.

"The opposition knows that they can't win by playing fair, and because they can't win by playing fair, they are ... trying to put all sorts of obstacles in place so that Ohioans can't cast their vote on whether or not Ohioans support abortion access," said Elizabeth Chasteen Day, organizing director of the ACLU of Ohio, a member of Ohioans for Reproductive Freedom.

In an interview with the Globe, Democratic state Representative Ismail Mohamed, the ranking member of the House committee on constitutional resolutions, characterized citizen-led ballot measures as a last line of defense, critical measures in states that are gerrymandered like Ohio that should be preserved.

Both chambers of the Ohio state House have proposals that would raise the threshold for constitutional amendments to pass from a simple majority to 60 percent, which, if approved by voters in an August special election, would make it much harder for the abortion amendment to succeed.

This momentum around making the constitutional amendment process more cumbersome has convinced many abortion rights activists that this year is their last, best chance to move forward with their measure.

In a virtual donor briefing in late March, one coalition member noted that if a special election is added to raise the amendment threshold, the campaign strategy for the abortion amendment would include encouraging voters to turn out in August to vote no to raising the threshold, and then to turn out again in November to vote yes on the abortion amendment, complicating their battle plan.

"There are other states that are already considering putting abortion on the ballot in 2024, so [this year] is also an opportunity to tap into funding that might not exist next year," said Erin Scott of Ohio Women's Alliance, one of the coalition partners in Ohioans for Reproductive Freedom. "We did the research to ensure that we're not about to make this multimillion dollar investment without knowing that we have an electorate that can win, and based on the national investments that are likely to happen in '24 elsewhere, it makes sense for Ohio to go this year."

Despite the lack of clarity around what the next few months might look like, advocates of abortion access are optimistic about their chances. Since the Dobbs v. Jackson Women's Health Organization decision last year, abortion rights supporters have a perfect winning streak on the state level, winning three proactive measures in Vermont, California, and Michigan. They've also defeated two antiabortion measures, in Kansas and Kentucky, states that have served as data points about how the protection of reproductive rights appeals to what are often otherwise conservative electorates.

In order to replicate that success, the Ohioans for Reproductive Freedom coalition has hired consultants that have experience working on the issue in other states and brought on paid staff to collect the approximately 413,000 verified signatures needed by July 5 to get the amendment on the ballot. Ohio Physicians for Reproductive Rights is also leading a signature-gathering effort, with more than 2,500 volunteers trained across the state. Together the groups are aiming for 700,000 signatures to ensure they qualify for the ballot.

Like the abortion rights side, members of the antiabortion coalition are confident their voters are still energized, even after successfully overturning Roe v. Wade.

"The level of engagement is still huge, and if anything this petition has motivated a lot of people," said Molly Smith, a founding member of Right to Life Action Coalition of Ohio and a board member of Protect Ohio Women, the antiabortion coalition campaign.

Back at Washington Park in Cincinnati, Kathy made fast work of gathering signatures, including from some who said they would make sure to show up to vote for it in November.

Deborah Ebben, of nearby Fairfield, was out with her family to see the Opening Day parade and said she'd be voting for the initiative in November if it was on the ballot. She said she'd once had a miscarriage and required a dilation and curettage procedure, putting the importance of care in personal terms.

"I had no issues getting the care that I needed; it was very straightforward. I just worry it's not always going to be like that," she said. With regard to the odds of the amendment passing in Ohio, she said that if the issue was before voters in the privacy of the ballot box, she thought that "it would probably pass."

The day passed without incident, until near the end of Kathy's shift. A man with a sign that read "Before I formed you in the womb, I knew you" started standing close by as she gathered signatures.

She became concerned that he would follow her back to her car until a male volunteer stepped in to help by asking the antiabortion activist to stick around with him.

While shaken, Kathy said there was a silver lining.

The antiabortion activist had annoyed one individual so much, he signed her petition book.

Democrats run on abortion, even in municipal contests

By Reid J. Epstein
NEW YORK TIMES

GREEN BAY, Wis. — Eric Genrich is running a full-throated campaign in support of abortion rights, reminding voters of his position at every turn and hammering his antiabortion opponent in television ads. At a recent event, he featured an obstetrician who now commutes to a state where abortion is legal to treat patients and a local woman who traveled to Colorado to terminate a nonviable pregnancy.

There's just one inconvenient reality: Genrich is running for reelection as mayor of Green Bay, an office that has nothing to do with abortion policy.

Even before the Supreme Court overturned Roe v. Wade last summer, putting back into effect a Wisconsin law from 1849 that bans nearly all abortions, the city did not have a clinic that performed the procedure, or a health department that regulated it.

Genrich is one of several candidates for municipal offices on the ballot this spring in races in Wisconsin, Chicago, St. Louis, Lincoln, Neb., and elsewhere who are making their support for abortion rights — and often their opponent's past opposition — a centerpiece of their campaigns, even though abortion policy in all of these places is decided at the state level.

Democrats used a muscular defense of abortion rights to great success in the midterm elections last fall, and, if that strategy works again, they are likely to copy it next year in races at all levels of government, including in President Biden's campaign if he seeks reelection.

The focus on abortion rights in down-ballot races, however, reflects Democrats' increased nationalization of local politics. For decades, local Republican candidates ran on issues like abortion, immigration, and national security, putting them in simple terms: "A noun, a verb, and 9/11," Biden once said in describing the phenomenon.

Now Democrats are doing the same on abortion in left-leaning cities, hoping to win over independent voters and some moderate Republicans.

Doing so allows Democrats to avoid discussing crime rates or other less appealing campaign topics. But beyond that, they recognize and emphasize that in today's tribal politics, the precise responsibilities of an office matter less than sending a strong signal to voters about one's broader political loyalties.

"It's definitely not a municipal issue per se," Genrich said in an interview. "Voters don't care about some of these parochial distinctions between municipal boundaries. This is a city issue, a state issue, a federal issue. Some of their most important questions are, what do you stand for fundamentally?"

Republicans running for mayor find themselves doing a political tap dance, trying to deemphasize but not disavow their opposition to abortion rights, which is not an electoral winner in Democratic cities. In Green Bay, Biden won 53 percent of the vote in 2020; last year, Governor Tony Evers, a Democrat, took 55 percent.

Genrich's opponent in Tuesday's officially nonpartisan election, Chad Weininger, is a former state legislator who cast a series of votes to restrict abortion rights before last year's Supreme Court ruling.

Emily's List, a group that backs women who support abortion rights, has endorsed mayoral candidates in Jacksonville, Fla., Madison, Wis., and Lincoln.

Regulators, lawmakers seek ways to hamstring rapid runs on banks

▶BANKS

Washington financial policy analyst at TD Cowen investment bank.

SVB's customers withdrew their money so rapidly that it stunned even veterans of the banking world.

"To the best of my knowledge, we've never seen deposits flee at the pace that they did from Silicon Valley Bank," Treasury Secretary Janet Yellen told a Senate hearing in the days after the collapse.

Jane Fraser, chief executive of banking giant Citigroup, said the speed of SVB's failure was "a complete game-changer." And billionaire hedge fund manager Bill Ackman tweeted that "in a world of @Twitter-speed spread of information and smartphone-enabled bank accounts where withdrawals can be made with the push of a button, no bank is safe from a run" unless the government insures all bank deposits — something federal regulators did for SVB.

Rob Nichols, chief executive of the American Bankers Association trade group, told an industry gathering on March 21 that he hoped the regulatory review of the failure examines "the speed at which longtime customers pulled their deposits out, and the significant role social media might have played in encouraging that behavior."

When Washington Mutual, known as WaMu, failed at the start of the 2008 financial crisis, social media platforms were in their early days as was mobile banking on smartphone apps. Today, apps are "the most prevalent primary method of account access," with 43.5 percent of households using them in 2021 compared to just 15.1 percent in 2017, according to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. And electronic transfers of money between banks are now processed much more frequently and for larger transaction amounts than they were 15 years ago.

WaMu's much slower descent allowed regulators to engineer its sale to JPMorgan Chase, protecting customers with deposits not covered by FDIC insurance. But SVB's rapid failure gave regulators just a weekend to sell it and prevent potential losses on deposits over the FDIC's limit of $250,000 per account when banks opened on Monday morning.

Unable to quickly find a buyer, federal officials stepped in and guaranteed all uninsured deposits at SVB and at Signature Bank, which also failed that weekend. The move was designed to prevent the contagion from spreading. Both banks were subsequently sold.

Bank Name	Assets	Total deposits	Bank run	Collapsed
Washington Mutual Bank	$307 billion	$188.3 billion	$16.7 billion in withdrawals from Sept. 15-24, 2008	Sept. 25, 2008, in largest US failure
Silicon Valley Bank	$209 billion	$175.4 billion	$42 billion in withdrawals on March 9	March 10, in second largest US failure

RYAN HUDDLE/GLOBE STAFF

But whether SVB was a canary in the coal mine or just an extremely rare bird has yet to be determined. Federal officials said the bank was poorly run. It was particularly susceptible to a run because an unusually large portion of its total deposits — 88 percent — exceeded the $250,000 federal insurance limit. And its highly connected clientele of high tech executives and venture capitalists helped quickly spread the fear.

SVB began cratering following a March 8 announcement that it lost about $1.8 billion on a sale of bonds because of rising interest rates. Venture capital firms, including one run by Peter Thiel, reportedly began withdrawing their money from the bank and strongly suggested their clients do the same.

"This was a bank run by big business and venture capital on e-mail threads and Linked-In," said Aaron Klein, an expert on financial technology at the Brookings Institution, a center-left think tank. The bank's 10 largest customers held a combined $13.3 billion in deposits, an unusually large amount.

Klein, a former Obama administration Treasury official who helped craft the banking reforms after the 2008 financial crisis, said regulators were using social media as a scapegoat for their own failures in preventing SVB's collapse.

"We couldn't see this coming because Twitter, like Twitter's something new? Come on," he said. "It's far easier to point the finger at Twitter than to look at themselves in the mirror and realize the mistakes that they continue to make."

But some lawmakers and experts said the concerns are valid.

"Some of the venture capitalists — and I'm a former venture capitalist — basically shouting fire in a crowded theater ... it raises real questions," Senator Mark Warner, a Virginia Democrat, said of venture capital firms urging their clients to pull out their money.

Representative Ritchie Torres, a New York Democrat, has introduced legislation that would require the Financial Stability Oversight Council, a panel of regulators established in the aftermath of the 2008 financial crisis, to monitor social media as part of its oversight of the nation's financial system and study if content on those platforms affects "financial panic and bank runs."

Hilary J. Allen, a law professor at American University and expert on new financial technologies, noted the unique qualities of Silicon Valley Bank. But she said the bank run, like the rapid Reddit-fueled rise of GameStop stock in 2021, shows "authorities should be prepared for panics accelerating very quickly through social media channels in the future."

She suggested a regulatory circuit breaker similar to what Wall Street uses to prevent so-called flash crashes by temporarily halting trades of a stock that's seeing unusual activity. The most famous instance of a similar strategy was when President Franklin Delano Roosevelt closed banks for a week in 1933 to ease a nationwide run during the depths of the Great Depression.

"Technology speeds things up a whole lot and sometimes what we really need is a pause," Allen said. A digital bank holiday, during which no money could be withdrawn online, would allow federal officials to deliver a message about the safety of the system the way FDR successfully did, she said.

Another option to halt a run would be to slow electronic transfers between banks through the automated clearinghouse system that processes them, said Kris James Mitchener, an economics professor at Santa Clara University who has studied financial crises. Regulators or bankers would try to digitally replicate a Depression practice of bank tellers being instructed to pay customers in pennies to slow the pace of withdrawals, he said.

"Just because the speed of the network allows you to move money fast doesn't mean your computers have to move that money fast," he said. "If you're facing a run, it's a fight for your bank's life."

Lawmakers, be bold and lift crushing burden of child-care costs

I appreciated that Tanzina Vega's recent op-ed ("The financial fragility of single parents who need child care," March 20) shined a spotlight on the unique challenges single parents face when trying to stay in the workforce. Like many, I've had to juggle raising my daughter and working a part-time job while attending school full time and working toward a certificate. Paying for child care on top of that is a burden that forces me to make impossible decisions about paying for other basic needs, from groceries to transportation.

Just last month, I spoke in front of lawmakers at the State House about the need to pass the Common Start legislation, which would make child care free for parents who, like me, are living below the poverty line. This bill would allow me to finish my degree faster, secure a better-paying job, and help me work toward becoming financially stable and eventually thrive. It would mean a brighter future for my daughter.

Vega could not be more right that immediate, bold action is needed by the public and private sectors. Child care is a human right, and when we meaningfully support single parents, everyone wins.

All in prison, not just some, should gain from Healey's education boost

I was encouraged to read that the Healey administration is planning to expand education to the tune of $10 million for incarcerated people in preparation for release, as noted in Ivy Scott's article about the School for Reentry at the Boston Pre-Release Center ("Healey aims to boost education for inmates," Metro, March 22). I agree that providing expanded educational opportunities for people as they prepare to leave prison brings net benefits for all.

However, I also hope for an expanded commitment to support educational opportunities for everyone in prison, regardless of their sentence length. Massachusetts has made a practice of restricting programming opportunities to those serving long or life sentences under the argument that such opportunities are wasted on people who will not reenter society.

In fact, people with long sentences participate in creating the culture of prisons. For example, in a graduation speech at the 2022 Emerson College commencement for incarcerated students who earned bachelor of arts degrees through the Emerson Prison Initiative, one student noted how access to college had changed the culture of MCI-Concord. "We used to be lifting weights and talking about the latest gossip," he said. "Now, we're discussing Foucault!"

While many alumni will leave prison and put their degrees to use outside, others are serving life sentences. I hope the Healey administration will think expansively about how to support education for all incarcerated people in the Commonwealth.

In portrait of released inmate, reader is left thinking of the victims

While reading Adrian Walker's recent front-page story celebrating the confessed double murderer Ramadan Shabazz, who was recently released from prison ("After 51 years, a new man," March 16), I kept waiting to learn more details about the murderer's victims. Who were they? Did they leave grieving survivors, and if so, who? Spouses, children, friends, lovers, colleagues? How old were they when their murderer permanently took their freedom? Other than the fact that they were security guards when murdered, what had they accomplished in their lives? What might they have contributed to the world if their lives had not been stolen? Do any people still grieve them after 51 years? Does anybody care?

Not only did Walker choose to ignore these details, he chose not to give the murdered victims the simple dignity of their names. To the readers of the article, they were no more than anonymous "security guards."

Having written the adulatory article about Shabazz's release, it would take true journalistic courage to now write a companion article mourning and recalling the lives of Shabazz's victims. I wonder if Walker or another Globe journalist will write it.

A teachable moment in Wayland, but will it be a learnable one?

Re "A rocky road for town's 1st Black school chief" (Page A1, March 30): In 1998 I started a business to help young people, primarily high school graduates who were Black or brown, attain entry-level jobs in the financial services field. Our mission was to prepare youth for the workplace through an intensive three-week training program encompassing not only the skills of using automated office systems but also the nuances of working in a company with people who didn't share their background. Companies compensated me when they hired a student, much like they did a recruiter. But here's where this arrangement fell short: We may have prepared the students, but we didn't prepare the workplace. As a result, the employees ran into headwinds (microaggressions) and many didn't feel a sense of belonging.

Perhaps Wayland wanted to be a more inclusive town when it hired Omar Easy, a Black man, as superintendent of schools, but possibly the town wasn't ready. If Wayland truly wants to embrace diversity, everyone will need to learn from this experience, reflect on why there have been so many stumbling blocks, and repair this situation, if it isn't too late.

The misleading arguments of MCAS foes

For years, it's been the mantra of opponents of the Massachusetts Comprehensive Assessment System exam: Requiring students to pass a test set at a 10th-grade level in order to graduate high school is unconscionable and cruel. It establishes such a hard-to-clear bar that thousands of students who would otherwise graduate are left behind, we've been told time and again.

The test has been an important part of the successful three-decade effort to improve public education in Massachusetts. It ensures that high school graduates will have basic competence in English, math, and one of several fields of science. Students have several opportunities to take the test during their high school years; if they fail initially, they and their teachers know where more academic work is required. Tracking the results, meanwhile, helps the state hold districts accountable for habitually failing schools.

JIM DAVIS/GLOBE STAFF

In August 2022, the Massachusetts Board of Elementary and Secondary Education voted on a controversial proposal to raise the standardized state test scores (MCAS) needed for students to graduate high school.

Still, if the MCAS exam really took such a large toll on seniors otherwise set to graduate, it would be a real cause for concern. But does it?

That claim has been a central part of the multi-front battle the Massachusetts Teachers Association, in particular, is waging against the MCAS graduation requirement. Here's what MTA President Max Page had to say in a December radio interview: "There are over 50,000 students who have failed to get a diploma, even though their teachers had said that they were ready to graduate with a diploma, but they didn't pass one part of the MCAS test."

An August letter to the Board of Elementary and Secondary Education signed by some 96 lawmakers made a similar claim. In that letter, which opposed raising the future passing scores for the MCAS, those lawmakers wrote: "Since MCAS became a graduation requirement for the Class of 2003, more than 52,000 students have reached the end of 12th grade without passing the MCAS exams required for graduation. Students who are denied diplomas based on MCAS scores have effectively been given the status of high school dropouts, regardless of whether or not they have successfully fulfilled all other graduation requirements."

Or consider this, from a State House News Service story, about what the leader of Citizens for Public Schools, an organization that historically has received substantial funding from the MTA and regularly echoes the union's stances, said at a September 2021 legislative hearing: "Executive Director Lisa Guisbond told lawmakers that since 2003, more than 52,000 Massachusetts students have reached the end of their senior years without meeting MCAS graduation requirements."

But the claim collapses on closer examination. According to 2015 to 2019 data compiled by the Department of Elementary and Secondary Education at the request of board of education Vice Chairman Matt Hills, of the high school seniors who didn't pass the MCAS in those years, between 72 percent and 74 percent also failed to complete their local district's graduation requirements.

That is, they wouldn't have graduated even if they had passed the MCAS.

For 2019, the last pre-COVID year, 2,752 seniors statewide, or about 4 percent of the senior class, did not graduate. Of that group, 2,050, or 74 percent, hadn't passed either the MCAS or met the local graduation requirements. Only 702 missed a diploma for want of passing the MCAS alone.

Nor does the notion that the MCAS exam is keeping large numbers of minority students from graduating, another frequent charge, withstand scrutiny. Overall, 92 percent of Black seniors graduated, as did 91 percent of Hispanic students, 82 percent of students with individualized education programs, and 78 percent of English-language learners.

Across all categories, a significantly higher percentage of those subgroups had both failed to pass the MCAS and failed to satisfy the local district requirements than had been denied a diploma based on the MCAS alone.

So what is the origin of the claim — or in other cases, the strong suggestion that stops just shy of a concrete assertion — that the MCAS had been singularly responsible for keeping 50,000 high school seniors from graduating?

Page said through a spokesperson that "the data was compiled by Citizens for Public Schools and Lisa Guisbond."

In an e-mail, Guisbond offered this explanation: "We calculated that, from 2003 through 2019, there were 52,745 students who were enrolled as seniors but did not pass the MCAS on their last opportunity to do so before leaving high school. Some of these may have also not met other requirements."

Now, wait a minute! Where has that crucial qualifier been when Page and the MTA and Citizens for Public Schools and other MCAS opponents have repeatedly cited 52,000 denied diplomas? As the recent five-year slice of DESE data above show, leaving it out obscures the fact that the large majority of seniors who don't pass the MCAS haven't met their local requirements either.

For her part, Guisbond said, via e-mail, "We did the best we could with the information we could find from DESE."

Perhaps. Still, it's unfortunate Guisbond and her group couldn't have checked their conclusions with DESE. Or that Page, the MTA, and other MCAS opponents apparently didn't do anything to ascertain the accuracy of figures that, however unlikely, seemed to bolster their argument.

The MCAS graduation requirement has been in effect since 2003, but the anti-MCAS arguments have taken on a particular intensity since 2010, when a new law authorized the state to use MCAS scores to identify, and intervene with, perennially underperforming schools. Those school-turnaround efforts sometimes override collective-bargaining agreements and occasionally mean laying off teachers deemed to be a poor fit for a particular school.

Now, the MTA is certainly entitled to advocate for its members' self-interest. But by now, it's pretty clear that policy makers and the public should be skeptical when union officials try to cloak their campaign against MCAS in the garb of what's good for students. As to the MTA and its allied groups, if they want policy makers and the public to take them seriously, they need to be much more scrupulous about the claims they make.

How powerful corporations are contributing to childhood obesity and asthma

By Heather Coleman and Katherine Gergen Barnett

With 1 in 5 children in the United States now qualifying as obese, recently released recommendations from the American Academy of Pediatrics highlight the enormous downstream consequences for these children, including increased risks for diabetes, heart disease, high blood pressure, and mental health concerns. While the 73-page document discusses the impacts of neighborhood, family and home, and genetics on the risk of childhood obesity, there is little mention of the corporations that have contributed to the surging rates of obesity in our country. Similar to other public health threats, this tracks with a long history of corporations pairing deceptive marketing with powerful lobbying influence to shift the blame and responsibility on consumers, and ensuring that politicians don't regulate them.

While rising rates of childhood obesity are correlated with many factors, one clear driver is added sugars and fats in processed foods that are cheap and directly marketed to children and families. For example, the American Heart Association recommends that children consume no more than 25 grams of added sugar per day; the average serving of chocolate milk contains 24 grams of added sugar, meeting a full day's limit in a single carton. Yet, owing in part to years of lobbying from dairy industry groups, chocolate milk continues to be on the menu in public schools across the country.

The Rudd Center for Food Policy and Health found that Black and Hispanic children are disproportionately targeted with advertising for products like candy, sugary drinks, snacks, and fast food. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention data cite much higher rates of obesity among Black and Hispanic children.

Similarly, the health risks of gas stoves associated with indoor air quality have been well-documented for decades. A new study concluded that roughly 12 percent of all childhood asthma cases are likely attributable to gas stoves. While the causal links between respiratory illness and gas pollution are well understood, industry associations and lobbyists fight regulatory progress at every turn.

The Energy and Policy Institute recently revealed that the Propane Education and Research Council, which is one of the largest spenders against climate policy in the United States, spent tens of millions of dollars on broadcast TV ads and HGTV influencer campaigns to persuade the public and policy makers that cooking with gas is essential and to stop all policy attempts that would support a transition to clean cooking appliances in our homes.

These health consequences are frightening for those dealing with them, and responsibility is often framed as solely on the individual to make better choices. But Americans should all be asking the question of what role corporations are playing on the health of our bodies. We cannot continue to let corporations decide what's best. Local communities and policy makers need to buttress public health through comprehensive approaches to tackling these complex problems, including holding corporations accountable.

LANE TURNER/GLOBE STAFF

The US Department of Agriculture recently proposed updated nutrition guidelines for public schools that would reduce the amount of added sugars in flavored milks and other high-sugar products, as well as reduce sodium limits for school breakfasts and lunches. Bills passed in Arkansas, Illinois, and Maryland support programs that double the value of federal food assistance benefits when qualifying consumers buy fresh or minimally processed fruits and vegetables at farmers markets.

Dozens of local governments throughout the country have moved to phase out gas appliances in new building construction, including in large cities like Seattle and San Francisco. A suite of clean energy incentives passed into law by Congress last year will soon provide direct rebates to consumers when they purchase more efficient electric appliances, including cooktops, ranges, and wall ovens.

These are all measures that are beginning to take back public health decisions from powerful and moneyed corporations, but they're only the beginning.

If we are truly going to work on tackling complicated issues such as childhood obesity and asthma, public institutions must perform clear-eyed data analysis on the impact of products being marketed to our communities and make hard choices to limit or block deceptive marketing that presents these products as the only option. No set of expert-laid health guidelines can truly make the intended impact if we do not first put health over profit.

It would improve life for residents and patients

By Sarah Brown

When I matched to medical residency at Massachusetts General Hospital, life felt like a dream. After years of hard work and dedication, I made it to one of the most prestigious hospitals in the country and the same city as my fiance.

Months into my residency, my engagement ended. Everything changed. I struggled to find a studio apartment that I could afford with a single resident income. My cost of living now exceeds my earnings, and I am relying on savings to make it through this rental period. When my co-residents and I socialize, we often find ourselves talking about the mounting credit card debt as a result of our moving to Boston, turning off our heat to save on energy bills, and the fading state of our mental health. Though we laugh it off when we're together, it's an entirely different experience to confront the bills or suffer the mental and physical toll of working 14 days straight.

> These unsustainable working conditions can have a devastating impact on residents and fellows, leading to burnout, depression, and alarmingly high rates of suicide.

No one begins their residency program thinking it will be easy. I knew it would be rigorous with long hours and high-pressure situations. However, nothing can truly prepare you for the emotional impact of being an intern at the bottom of the food chain, the sleep deprivation, or the disconnect from normal life that comes with working 80 hours a week in life-or-death situations — not to mention the demoralizing feeling of nearly half of your work hours being consumed by administrative tasks that prevent you from spending meaningful time with your patients.

As residents, we're committed to providing exceptional care for our patients. But we're often powerless to advocate for changes that would benefit both our patients and ourselves.

For over a century, health care systems have exploited resident and fellow physicians as a cheap source of labor. We're legally bound to sign an employment contract that offers no room for salary or benefit negotiation, leaving us with little control over the working conditions that directly impact patient care. To make matters worse, many of us are saddled with crushing debt, often exceeding $250,000, due to the exorbitant costs of medical education, made even more unbearable by the skyrocketing cost of living.

These unsustainable working conditions can have a devastating impact on residents and fellows, leading to burnout, depression, and alarmingly high rates of suicide. Physician burnout can also have a negative impact on patients, increasing the likelihood of medical errors, unprofessional behavior, and lower patient satisfaction.

Unfortunately, our attempts to advocate for change through official channels often go unaddressed. When program leadership expressed concern about the number of house staff living paycheck to paycheck, Mass General Brigham initially chose not to address the issue. It was only after our union movement grew too loud to ignore that MGB coincidentally announced a 10 percent raise and annual stipend for residents and fellows to offset the cost of living.

The experience has taught us the true power of collective action, and we refuse to wait on the sidelines any longer. We should never have to choose between our careers and our health, and patients should never suffer due to unsustainable working conditions.

Resident unions across the country have made significant strides in improving working conditions and patient care standards. House staff at NYC Health + Hospitals, who are unionized with the Committee of Interns and Residents, established a $1 million Patient Care Trust Fund and purchased $600,000 in equipment to improve patient care for some of the poorest and sickest New Yorkers. CIR members at Santa Clara Valley Medical Center won $50,000 in back pay for missed retirement contributions. Since joining CIR in 2018, University of California, Los Angeles residents and fellows have won 56 percent in salary increases as well as an unprecedented fertility benefit package that is inclusive of LGBTQ couples.

These victories have shown us what is possible to gain for ourselves and our patients through a collective voice. I imagine what two holidays with family could mean, or how retirement support could manifest robust savings, and what a patient care fund could achieve.

As one of the wealthiest and most renowned health care systems in the country, MGB prides itself on being a hub of inspiring innovators on the cutting edge of medicine. A house staff union would only enhance the quality of its workforce. Happier and healthier residents make happier and healthier patients, and that is something worth fighting for. We are forming a union so, together, we can build a better future for residents, our patients, and health care as a whole.

Unionization puts doctor training at risk

By William Curry

How do we care for those who care for us? It's an important question — especially after the COVID-19 pandemic pushed every doctor, nurse, and medical staffer to the brink. The debate has now reached doctors in training — also known as residents and fellows — who are in the process of deciding whether they want a union at Mass General Brigham.

I've stood in their shoes, training to become a neurosurgeon at Massachusetts General Hospital. Now, as a faculty member, I have the great privilege of training this next generation of great physicians.

> Mass General Brigham is investing in our residents in so many ways because it's the right thing to do and it's what they deserve.

Mass General Brigham's training programs are among the country's top-ranked — and will be the highest-paid come this summer. However, as the economy has changed, so have the needs of our workforce — inside the hospital and out. That's why Mass General Brigham began a multiyear process to assess and raise salaries across the organization two years ago. Mass General Brigham increased pay for trainees in July and this year trainees will receive a 10 percent pay increase; better benefits, such as no-cost health insurance and employer contribution to a retirement savings plan; and a $10,000 stipend for such needs as housing or child care.

But as doctors, we are lifelong learners, committed to finding ways to continually make improvements. That's why residents are also part of decision-making on matters critical to their programs through Mass General Brigham's newly created Education Operations Coordinating Committee, bringing fast and direct changes in response to their needs, including new teams to manage patient overflow and more administrative support on inpatient floors.

Mass General Brigham is investing in our residents in so many ways because it's the right thing to do and it's what they deserve. But I worry about the impact collective bargaining could have on how Mass General Brigham trains doctors for the future and the lasting impact it could have on their careers by limiting access to educational resources and the flexibility residents need to chart their own paths.

I think of one former student who came to my neurosurgery department for training. He was already brilliant and trained in immunology, and we knew that he could bring those skills to the operating table to become an equally brilliant neurosurgeon. We worked with him to create an individualized plan that would enable him to train in neurosurgery with us and to further his research at the same time. This collaborative effort has led to the development of a promising new therapy for brain tumors and new hope to patients. Based on this work, he recently enrolled the first patient in a clinical trial to receive cutting-edge CAR T-cell therapy, all while mentoring trainees as a faculty member at the hospital.

Another resident, already an expert in neuroscience, realized she wanted to shift gears to study cancer and become a skull base surgeon. Change like this is not easy when you are training in a medical specialty, but we worked with her to give her access to experts in both fields and offered the flexibility she needed to focus on skull base surgery while also conducting cancer research. This helped her get the experience she needed to land one of the most sought-after skull base surgery fellowships in the world.

These are only two of my stories. Every resident, and every mentor and teacher, has similar stories. For me, my proudest moment was when my own mentor, someone who many years later I still consult with on my cases, called me to consult on a case of his own.

When I am in the operating room, my resident and I are assisted by an exceptional team of technicians, anesthesiologists, and nurses. But when it comes down to making that split-second decision on how to save or better a life — it is just me and my resident. In that moment, the resident is my only partner. It is hands-on and emotional. We rely on each other. We are a team.

How much of this experience can be collectively bargained? Honestly, I don't know. A union, almost by definition, creates a disconnected and adversarial relationship. And a 2021 Journal of the American Medical Association study found that resident unions did not lead to improved satisfaction on things like burnout, job satisfaction, or salary.

There is always more that Mass General Brigham can and will do, together with our residents, to ensure we deliver on our promise of an outstanding educational environment. But I fear a union could derail those efforts, limiting our ability for flexibility and putting at risk the real-time team experience our doctors-in-training need to be successful — in their careers and for the patients they care for.

dential help line to assist families, usually parents, who are grappling with a child on the verge of extremist violence.

"They put us in these peer groups with other people going through the same situation … there were some people whose children had joined the KKK, so listening to them, learning from them, talking to them, finally it felt like you are not alone," the father said.

The latest numbers for Massachusetts show an alarming surge in antisemitic assaults, vandalism, and harassment in 2022, according to recent reports from the Anti-Defamation League. The 41 percent increase in antisemitic acts in Massachusetts since 2021 outpaced increases in New England and across the United States, placing the state among the top six for such activity in the country.

The league also tracked a worrisome jump in white supremacist activity, including the distribution of racist, antisemitic, and anti-LGBTQ+ fliers and other propaganda, with Massachusetts second only to Texas for the highest levels of activity last year.

Parents for Peace was launched to try to counter this trend, cofounded by a Memphis father, Melvin Bledsoe, whose son was involved in a radical group and attacked an army recruitment center in Little Rock, killing one young soldier and wounding another.

While the Anti-Defamation League's data show a steady increase of hate acts in the past several years, the jump since 2020 — when many schools shut down during the first year of the COVID-19 pandemic — is striking. Many children were online for hours a day, often isolated.

Myrieme Churchill, a psychotherapist and Parents for Peace executive director, said that isolation appears to have provided a fertile climate for extremists to lure vulnerable kids toward radical ideology. The group's help line was ringing a lot.

She said her group has helped dozens of families nationwide step back from the brink of extremism involving a wide range of groups, from QAnon and the Ku Klux Klan to the Islamic State and eco-terrorism.

SUZANNE KREITER/GLOBE STAFF

Typically, it's parents who call the hot line. An evaluator will spend at least an hour building a profile and history of the young person: whether they've been bullied, have addiction or mental health issues, if they've suffered any trauma, how much time they're spending online, whether they're isolating themselves from family and friends, and if law enforcement needs to be alerted to a possible threat.

Afterward, a family is referred to an "interventionist," someone who used to be in an extremist group but has been deradicalized. The interventionist then begins the hard work of building the family's trust, through regular calls and Zoom meetings, peeling back layers of fear and anger to reveal who the young person was, and what their passions were, before they spiraled into hate.

"If you go to the dentist and have a cavity, it's not going to get better on its own; you have to dig and clean up the decay," Churchill said. "Wherever the grief is, that's where we need to go, and that's where the journey starts."

But getting families to open up can be a months-long process.

"Parents are terrified the whole family will be labeled as racist because other people don't get it," Churchill said. "They get isolated by shame and fear."

The Massachusetts couple were desperate for help when they finally found their way to Parents for Peace in 2020, after unsuccessfully trying religious counseling and private therapy. But it would take their son another 14 months to even agree to meet with anyone from the organization.

All kids struggle with the pressures of growing up, said Dr. Ronald Schouten, director emeritus of the law & psychiatry service at Massachusetts General Hospital.

Schouten said young people typically find their identity through their peers.

"If the only peers around are in a gang, or … a community of violent extremists, and this is where social media plays such a role, for kids who are isolated and alone, suddenly they find a community [online] and it's an echo chamber," Schouten said.

Young people who have suffered a trauma, such as a death in the family or a sexual assault, may be more vulnerable to extremist influences, as are those who have autism spectrum disorder, said Jessica Stern, a research professor at Boston University and a senior fellow at the Harvard T.H. Chan School of Public Health.

"It's not that we think traumatized kids will become extremists, but that traumatized kids may be over-represented in the population of extremists," said Stern, who is studying the first 45 cases handled by Parents for Peace to see if she can identify common signs, such as abuse, loneliness, or mental health issues, that might point to future problems.

The Massachusetts parents who encountered the FBI at their door said their teenager had been a normal kid, hanging out with friends, playing baseball and basketball. But about six months before that fateful knock, he became withdrawn and spent more time alone in his room, online.

"We noticed that, but thought he was just going through a phase," his mother said.

Turns out, their son was being bullied at school.

The FBI agents initially referred them to a mosque they thought might help because the family is Muslim, but the pull of extremism was too strong, the parents said. The antigay, antisemitic diatribes from their son only increased.

"It was almost like an addiction," the father said. "We took his Internet away, and he just kept going to different computers and looking up things, news about attacks in different countries."

After nearly two years of working unsuccessfully with people from the mosque, the parents hired a therapist who specialized in de-radicalization. That didn't help much either. But the therapist finally connected them in 2020 with Parents for Peace, and slowly the grip of extremism started to loosen.

Unlike the other places, they said, Parents for Peace took a holistic approach, listening and working with the entire family.

"They are an extraordinary organization and kind of one-of-its-kind," said Andrew Dreyfus, former chief executive of Blue Cross Blue Shield of Massachusetts who was an early champion of Parents for Peace and is now helping them raise funds and formalize their organization.

He compares its approach to the one now routinely used in health care to ferret out and treat cases of domestic violence.

"There was a time when we didn't talk about domestic violence as health care," he said. "Now it's part of our annual visit. You are asked: Do you feel safe at home?"

Dreyfus said extremism has similarly been viewed as on the edge of the health care system. "But I think Parents for Peace is helping people understand it needs to be more mainstream," he said.

The Massachusetts teenager Parents for Peace helped is now in college. The young man's parents pause when asked if he has fully recovered because, they say, they don't want to jinx it.

"He is at a place where we thought honestly two years ago we never thought he would be," said the father. "You can hear it in his voice, in his tone. He is talking about other stuff now."

Addiction advocates on guard for a rise in problem gambling

▶GAMBLING

volume lately but doesn't expect to be inundated, said Jen Cyran, managing director of behavioral health at the agency that runs the help line, Health Resources in Action.

In Ohio, calls to the addiction help line have tripled in the year since sports betting was legalized. A few years after New Jersey legalized online sports betting in 2018, the prevalence of gambling disorder was found to be three times the rates seen in other populations that had been studied.

In Massachusetts, researchers hired by the Massachusetts Gaming Commission say they expect the effect of legalization to be "modest." That's because Massachusetts gamblers were already betting online at rates similar to those in states where sports betting was allowed; they could easily access out-of-state sites, even though it was illegal.

A similar phenomenon occurred when casinos first opened in Massachusetts, according to the researchers. People who wanted to gamble had already been frequenting casinos in Connecticut; the number of gamblers didn't increase — they just gambled closer to home.

That said, researchers from the University of Massachusetts School of Public Health and Health Science caution that opening the floodgates to mobile betting could draw in new groups of people vulnerable to its allure — such as adolescents, young adults, women, immigrants, individuals in recovery from gambling problems, and college athletes.

Keith Whyte, executive director of the National Council on Problem Gambling, expects Massachusetts "to see an increase in the severity of existing gambling problems and perhaps an increase in the rate of gambling problems."

But he said he is less worried about Massachusetts because the state "has a statewide plan to address problem gambling. Few other states have that."

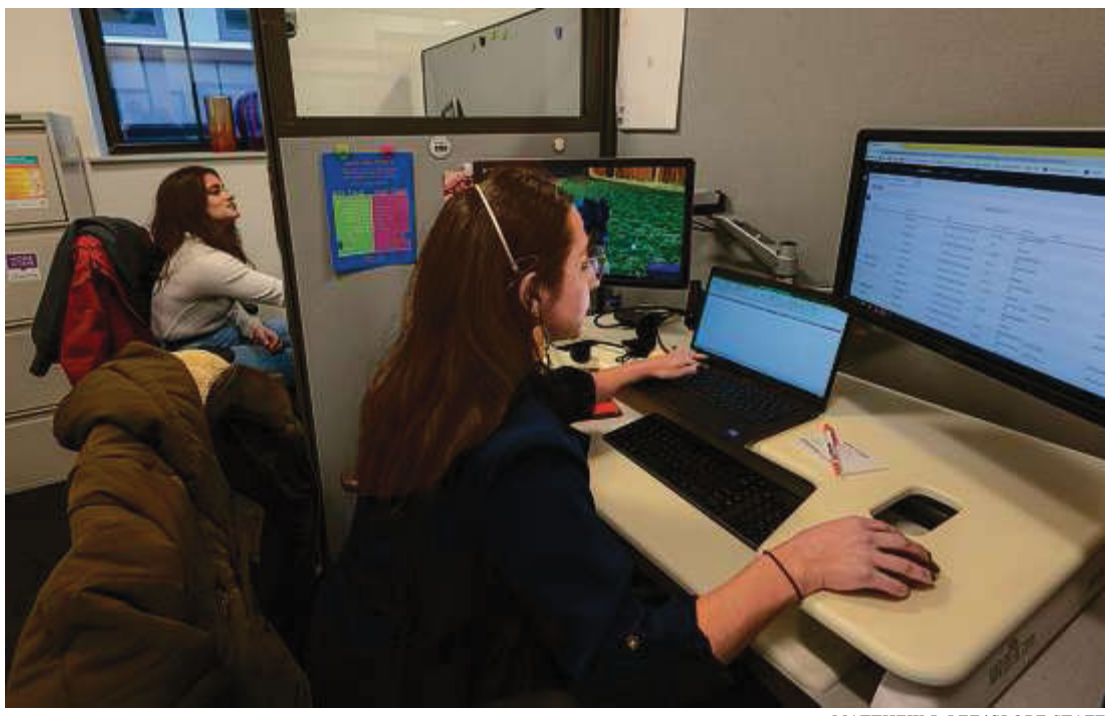
A Public Health Trust Fund funnels a percentage of gambling revenue into efforts to mitigate its harms. The state's Office of Problem Gambling Services, which started in 2016 within the Department of Public Health, received $12 million from the trust fund this year. The money pays for the help line as well as prevention and treatment programs.

For the vast majority of people, gambling is a form of harmless entertainment. But for an estimated 1 percent to 3 percent of US adults, it becomes a destructive compulsion. A big win can trigger a powerful feeling that some gamblers yearn to experience again and chase into financial ruin.

Some 97 percent of people who have a gambling addiction already have experienced an addiction to drugs or alcohol or have a mental illness, said Victor Ortiz, director of the state's Office of Problem Gambling Services.

"People of color are disproportionately impacted by gambling disorder," said Ortiz, adding that problem gambling is interconnected with a host of other social issues. "The two major risk factors that drive people from recreational stages of gambling to problematic stages are low educational attainment and low economic status."

Teenagers and young men are of particular concern. "Sports betting may strongly appeal to young boys," Whyte said. "There's some evidence that young boys of color are even more likely to bet on sports and develop problems."



MATTHEW J. LEE/GLOBE STAFF

Sunny (left) and Maria took callers' information for a help line at Health Resources in Action. The pair asked that their last names not be used. The service on addictions is open 24/7.

And, cautioned Rachel A. Volberg, the UMass professor who has led the state's gambling research, "the younger you are when you start gambling, the more likely you are to develop a problem."

You can tell gambling might be getting out of hand if it stops being fun, and instead makes you irritable and anxious. Other signs are hiding your gambling from family and friends and continuing to gamble despite financial troubles.

In its diagnostic guide, the American Psychiatric Association groups gambling disorder with other addictive disorders, because it involves many of the same features, including compulsively continuing an activity despite the harm it causes. "The same brain mechanism is involved in all these addictive disorders," Volberg said.

So when people call the state's gambling help line, they're actually calling the same line that Health Resources in Action operates to help people concerned about drug and alcohol addiction. Three years ago, the agency added gambling to its portfolio, and today two-thirds of help line callers are engaged in gambling. Nearly three-quarters of those who call about gambling are men and the largest age group is 20 to 29.

All the staff members answering the phone are trained to answer questions about either issue. They can guide callers in assessing their risk and direct them to resources, including one of 22 outpatient treatment programs. Another option: voluntary self-exclusion, a program in which gamblers can have themselves barred from gambling for a certain period, or for life.

The numbers of people opting for voluntary self-exclusion "have gone through the roof" among those who want to avoid online betting, said Marlene D. Warner, chief executive of the Massachusetts Council on Gaming and Health. "They may have signed up for an account and quickly realized how overwhelming it can be to be sucked into the excitement of it all," she said.

Also sucking people in is the ubiquitous advertising for sports betting, some offering deals that can be hard to resist.

"These ads are everywhere. No one can really get away from them," Bishop said. "I have a 7-year-old — they were coming up on his tablet, which has youth settings on there. … It's quite scary for people working on this issue."

Mark Vander Linden, director of research and responsible gaming at the Massachusetts Gaming Commission, said the state's advertising rules are already among the most rigorous in the country. Still, the commission recently adopted a few of the changes recommended by Attorney General Andrea Joy Campbell, such as requiring operators to strengthen their methods for excluding people younger than 21 and to disclose when an influencer has been paid to endorse a betting platform.

The commission also did a study to characterize what they call "positive play" — gambling behavior that doesn't cause problems. They identified three characteristics: the willingness to set a limit before starting to gamble; an understanding of how the games work and what the true odds are; and "honesty and control," that is, a realistic view of gambling's role in one's life, and the ability to keep it under control.

If every gambler engaged in this "positive play," would the operators be able to make a profit? Vander Linden paused, and called that "a difficult question."

The commission's mission is to ensure an economic boost for the state and "an appropriate return" for operators — and also to mitigate gambling harms, he said. Vander Linden acknowledged a "tension" between those goals. But he said the commission would work "to the maximum extent that we can" to prevent gambling harms.

Cape Cod Canal shut to protect right whale mother, calf

Pair get police escort as dozens of endangered animals linger in bay

By Daniel Kool
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

The Cape Cod Canal closed for more than five hours Sunday to accommodate a right whale mother and her calf, who had entered the waterway, according to environmental officials.

The whales swam into the canal around 10:30 a.m., prompting the Army Corps of Engineers to close it shortly after the pair appeared, according to a spokesperson from the Executive Office of Energy and Environmental Affairs. Boat traffic was minimally impacted, she said, with one car carrier opting to navigate around the Cape instead of waiting for the canal to clear.

The whales entered from Cape Cod Bay, escorted by Massachusetts Environmental Police boats as they swam west toward a stretch of water between the Bourne and Sagamore bridges, wending their way around a tug and barge, the spokesperson said.

Hours later, the pair turned around and left the canal, rejoining a group of at least 79 right whales congregating in the bay.

About half of those whales have been grouping by the entrance to the canal since Saturday. They were first spotted last week by the Center for Coastal Studies, the Globe previously reported.

The endangered whales now congregating around Cape Cod make up about a quarter of the world's population of North Atlantic right whales. Right whales have faced unusually high mortality rates since 2017, often struck by vessels or tangled in fishing lines, outpacing birth rates, according to NOAA.

The Army Corps of Engineers, by protocol, closes the canal to traffic when a right whale is spotted inside the waterway. The corps allowed traffic to resume Sunday around 4 p.m., shortly after the whales left, according to the spokesperson.

Charles "Stormy" Mayo, director of research for the Provincetown-based Center for Coastal Studies' right whale ecology program, praised the Corps of Engineers for moving quickly to close the canal to safeguard the mother and calf.

"It's not easy for shippers," Mayo said, "but that little calf is a precious animal."

Fewer than 350 of the right whales are left, with less than 70 breeding females, according to preliminary estimates by the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

Authorities are also trying to help an 8-year-old right whale that was first spotted south of Nantucket in February entangled in ropes, some caught in her mouth and wrapped around her body and flippers. On Wednesday, the

City needs to fix racial inequity on climate

Report: Justice must be among green goals

By Dharna Noor

Mountains of research show that in Boston and other American cities, poor and working class people of color are disproportionately harmed by climate change and pollution. That inequality is by design, but can begin to be undone if the city prioritizes justice in its environmental and climate plans, according to a new report.

INTO THE RED
CLIMATE AND THE FIGHT OF OUR LIVES

"During the next three decades, Boston will adopt numerous policies and practices and invest billions of dollars to achieve climate resilience and transition to a decarbonized economy," the assessment says. "What they decide can ensure that racial equity is advanced as Boston pursues its climate goals. Or it can exacerbate and perpetuate inequities."

The report was issued recently by the Boston Green Ribbon Commission — a group of business, institutional, and civic leaders working to address climate change — alongside Embrace Boston, a racial justice nonprofit established by the Boston Foundation in 2017. It looks back at dozens of previous studies to detail the history of environmental injustice in the city and offers ideas for how to undo the harms.

"None of this is new material," said Amy Longsworth, director of the Boston Green Ribbon Commission. "But what we wanted to do was consolidate it in a short format that would be digestible."

A history of racist policy choices, such as redlining (the government-led practice beginning in the 1930s of denying people of color home loans and insurance and labeling their neighborhoods "hazardous" to real estate investors) and a persistent lack of investment in majority people of color neighborhoods have left Black and brown Bostonians disproportionately vulnerable to the impacts of climate change and environmental degradation, the report says.

For instance, Boston neighborhoods that are home to communities of color — including formerly redlined ones — have less greenery and fewer trees than more affluent, white neighborhoods, the authors write. This can increase vulnerability to extreme heat as abundant concrete and asphalt soak up the sun's FALL RIVER — At 230 Second St., a green clapboard house sits eerily quiet. An American flag pokes out of the doorway, flapping in the wind, as shrubbery lies beside the steps leading up to the house.

The home blends in with the rest of the houses in Fall River — if it weren't for the signs indicating it was the location of an infamous 1892 unsolved double murder and a hotspot for paranormal activity.

The Victorian-era home where Lizzie Borden was accused — and acquitted — of murdering her father and stepmother has undergone numerous renovations to preserve its dark history since Lance Zaal, CEO and founder of US Ghost Adventures, took ownership of the house in May 2021. Coming up on two years of ownership, the company gave the Globe a tour of the upgrades, expected to wrap up later this year.

"We have a duty to make sure that the house is taken care of," Zaal said. "We get so many guests every year, and it's an important piece of of New England history and Fall River history."

Co-workers recall reporter who broke Strangler story

Loretta McLaughlin linked slayings early on

By Daniel Kool

It was their status as "nobodies" that first drew journalist Loretta McLaughlin to the victims of the Boston Strangler, she once wrote.

Where an editor saw a handful of unrelated deaths, McLaughlin saw a series of connected murders that were likely committed by a single person. Writing for the Boston Record American, she worked with colleague Jean Cole to write what became the first series of news articles on the Boston Strangler, who killed at least 13 women in and around the city between 1962 and 1964.

Their story is retold in "Boston Strangler," a movie released last month on Hulu to mixed reviews. Keira Knightley plays McLaughlin, with co-star Carrie Coon as Cole.

Albert DeSalvo admitted to 11 of the murders but was never convicted of them, and his confessions had long been questioned because of inconsistencies in his story. He was convicted of unrelated rape charges and sentenced to life in prison, where he was fatally stabbed by an inmate in 1973.

A former Melrose resident was killed last month in Phoenix by a man who also shot his young son before turning the gun on himself, according to police.

Sarah Scott, 37, was found dead on March 21 by Phoenix police conducting a welfare check at a home in the area of 8600 South 16th Place shortly before 11 a.m., said Sergeant Brian Bower, a police spokesperson, in a statement.

Scott was four months pregnant when she died. Officers also discovered the body of 6-year-old Jacob De Zeeuw Jr., and the boy's father, Jacob De Zeeuw, the statement said.

The boy's body was found in the home's backyard along with one of the adults, police said. The body of the other adult was inside the house. Police have not said specifically where the bodies of Scott and De Zeeuw were found.

Investigators have determined that De Zeeuw, 27, shot Scott and his son at the home, and then killed himself, the statement said. Police have not released any information about what led to the shootings, which remain under investigation, according to the statement.

De Zeeuw and Scott were in a dating relationship, according to a Facebook post from the Melrose Alliance Against Violence.

Scott was a 2005 graduate of Melrose High School who earned a degree from the Massachusetts College of Pharmacy and Health Sciences in 2011, her death notice said. She worked for 14 years at Walgreens Pharmacy, where she began as an intern and ultimately became a manager, according to the death notice. She moved to Arizona in 2016 to continue her career with Walgreens. She went on to work for PillPack and later became a lead pharmacist with Amazon Pharmacy, the death notice said.

"Sarah was so excited to welcome her baby boy into the world in August," her death notice said. "Her favorite quote to live by was, 'Life is goin by so fast, U only wanna do what you think is right.' "

She enjoyed traveling, riding her motorcycle, and attending CrossFit and Jiu-Jitsu sessions, the death notice said.

A celebration of life for Scott will be held April 15 at Spinelli's in Peabody from 1 to 5 p.m.

On Saturday night, dozens of people gathered for a vigil for Scott at a Jiu-Jitsu gym, where the couple trained, according to Arizona's Family, a local CBS-TV affiliate. A separate vigil for De Zeeuw and his son was expected to be held Sunday night, the station reported.

Jay Pages, the gym's owner, knew the couple and told the station that friends were grappling with what happened.

"It's unbearable right now for all of us. We're just trying to go day by day," Pages said.

Pages hadn't seen the couple at the gym since last year, but they had appeared to be happy, he told the station. If they had been having trouble, he said, friends would have tried to help.

"If there was an issue, I wished she would've reached out. You know, I wish we knew, maybe we could have stepped in, maybe we could've helped either one of them," Pagessaid.

A postal carrier who had his hip replaced after being attacked by a turkey in Cambridge last month says he plans to return to the same route after recovering.

Ed Mitchell, 49, who lives in Weymouth, has been working the same Cambridge route — plus or minus a few streets — for more than 20 years and said he never had a significant issue with the local wildlife until last year, when a trio of aggressive turkeys appeared around Harvard Square, acting aggressively toward him and other carriers.

"They're mean," Mitchell said in a phone interview Sunday. "It's only like three bad ones. I don't know if something's happened to them. Maybe one of them got killed by a mail truck."

They usually flock along Garden Street, he said, but two of the birds had settled in front of a home around 60 Huron Ave. on March 20. Mitchell said he was crossing the street around 2:30 p.m. when he realized the turkeys had spotted him.

"I started hearing the noises," he said. "That's when they started getting aggressive."

Mitchell stepped into the road, positioning himself so that a tree and pair of trash barrels were between himself and the birds, but as he turned to look, one of the turkeys was flying toward him. Wild turkeys can fly at speeds of up to 50 miles per hour, according to the United States Fish and Wildlife Service.

"They usually don't catch up to me, but this time they were right on top of me," he said. "I didn't know if they were going for my eyes."

Mitchell said he did not fully remember where or how the turkey hit him, but said it knocked him onto the pavement, where it continued to peck at him before passersby shooed the pair away. "They didn't give up," he said.

During breeding season, which lasts from March to May, wild turkeys are more active in Massachusetts and may display higher levels of aggression, according to the Massachusetts Division of Fisheries and Wildlife. The state recommends scaring aggressive turkeys away "with loud noises, swatting with a broom or water sprayed from a hose."

An ambulance rushed Mitchell to Mount Auburn Hospital, where he underwent replacement surgery on his right hip two days later, before being discharged the following Friday.

Some hospital staff "loved the story," he said, and told him they had never seen someone injured so badly by a turkey.

Nearly two weeks after the incident, Mitchell said he is walking but needs to use a walker and a cane for balance.

Residents along Mitchell's mail route expressed their concerns for the carrier, whom they called "Eddie" in posts on Nextdoor. Mitchell said EHChocolatier, a chocolate shop along the route, sent him flowers and balloons when the owners heard he had been in the hospital.

Stephen Doherty, a spokesman for the Massachusetts branch of the United States Post Office, declined to comment on Mitchell's case specifically, but confirmed that a mail carrier was attacked by turkeys in Cambridge.

"People often feel bad for our carriers when they're delivering in snow, rain or other foul weather but they can prepare for those contingencies," Doherty wrote in an e-mail. "It's the hazards you don't expect, like the hose or rake under the leaves or the animal you've walked past 100 times without incident, that can take you by surprise."

Mitchell said it will be about six months before he is able to deliver the mail again, and he is not sure how well he will navigate his hilly route.

"If I take another fall, that's all I need," Mitchell said. "I'm going to be paranoid every time I see them now."

Northeastern student seriously injured in fall

Incident called a 'tragic accident'

GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

A Northeastern University student was seriously injured Saturday evening after falling from a window in Mission Hill, according to officials.

Boston police responded just before 7 p.m.to a home on Judge Street, where they found the woman suffering from life-threatening injuries, said Officer Michael Torigian, a department spokesman, in a brief phone interview Sunday. She was transported her to a local hospital, he said.

Northeastern officials confirmed that a student had suffered "what appears to be a tragic accident" on Saturday evening.

"We are awaiting confirmation from the hospital on the student's current condition," university spokeswoman Renata Nyul said in an e-mail Sunday morning. "Because this incident is the subject of a police investigation, we cannot comment further at this time."

Foul play is not suspected, Torigian said.

The incident occurred at a wood-frame house on a small, private way in Mission Hill — an area that is home to a large college student population.

The street was quiet Sunday morning. Outside the home at 2 Judge St., Zoe, a Northeastern junior who declined to give her last name, said she was "good friends" with the victim, who is a sophomore. She said the two were part of a group of approximately 40 people who were getting ready to go out for the night when the incident occurred.

"I was just hanging out in the kitchen when someone who lives [in the building] shouted, 'Someone fell out the window.' "

Zoe, who had been dressed up for the event, threw off her heels and ran down the stairs to the front of the building, where students had earlier been taking photos. She said she saw her friend lying face down on the ground, unresponsive and bleeding from her ears.

She helped usher other students out of the area as emergency responders arrived, she said.

"I wasn't processing it, "she said. "I was just doing what I could... Everyone there did everything they could've done."

Zoe said that she hadn't heard any updates after her friend was taken to the hospital but knew the woman's family was with her.

She said her friend had leaned against a window that was apparently open and fell through the screen onto the pavement below.

"Obviously, it's very traumatizing, "she said. "We had gotten pictures together, like 20 minutes before. It's crazy how something like this can just happen."

> 'I was just hanging out in the kitchen when someone who lives [in the building] shouted, 'Someone fell out the window.' '
> ZOE, Northeastern junior who said she is friends with the woman who fell out the window

Alex Cordova, a Northeastern senior, lives on the first floor, said that many of the students living on the street are part of fraternities and sororities. He didn't think anything of the commotion, he said, until he came to the window Saturday evening and saw an ambulance in his driveway.

"I wasn't too concerned at first — I assumed maybe someone was just too drunk at some place," he said. "But then you look and there's another ambulance, six or seven cop cars, and [Northeastern University police]. Then I realized the magnitude of it."

Cordova said he was "shocked" at the unsettling incident. He said he'd checked in with his neighbors upstairs where the woman had fallen, but had not heard any updates since the night before.

"It's probably a very sensitive subject for them right now," he said.

Report: Repairing climate injustice must be a priority

rays and radiate heat due to a lack of shade.

"It's just crazy," said Longsworth, "to look at the temperature differentials during the day between Chinatown and the reservoir in Brookline." Studies show Chinatown is the city's hottest neighborhood, with temperatures during heat waves as much as 10 degrees higher than other Boston neighborhoods.

Some low-income neighborhoods and those with people of color as a majority also have limited access to health care and grocery stores, the report says. In recent years, two census tracts in West Roxbury and East Boston officially met federal standards for "food deserts," areas that have limited access to a grocery store or other healthy, affordable food retail outlets. Many low-income people of color also live near few hospitals and health clinics, the authors say.

As a result, during flooding events that disrupt access to roads and transit, which are becoming more common amid the climate crisis, residents can be cut off from obtaining medicine and food, the assessment says.

People of color in cities like Boston are also disproportionately likely to have low incomes, leaving them less able to economically handle property damage, halted public transit, and days off work amid extreme weather events.

Low-income Bostonians also pay twice as much of their household income toward utilities, compared with the average household; for very poor households, the energy burden is four times as great, rising to as much as 12 percent of household income, the report says, citing Census Bureau Data. That's especially concerning during extreme weather events like cold snaps or heat waves.

The report is not simply meant to inspire shame, said Duncan Remage-Healey, director of advancement and external affairs at Embrace Boston. It also outlines ways to bring about change.

"Hopefully a report like this calls people in, as opposed to continuing to just wave a finger," he said.

The authors suggest prioritizing vulnerable populations, including communities of color, when investing in climate resilience. For instance, Boston has completed coastal resilience plans for the five neighborhoods most at risk from sea level rise and coastal flooding, including more than 100 potential projects, and must choose which projects to move on first.

"Partly they have to be prioritized based on [where there are] the biggest, hairiest, scariest risks," said Longsworth, of the Boston Green Ribbon Commission. But beyond that, officials could prioritize neighborhoods where there has been a history of under-investment, she said.

Another opportunity: prioritizing low-income people and people of color for climate-friendly technologies, weatherization, and retrofits. These projects can lower energy costs, make homes more comfortable in extreme weather, and improve indoor air quality, while boosting the value of properties.

"Who has access to the kind of capital to buy solar panels or electric car infrastructure or heat pumps?" said Remage-Healey, adding that even with federal subsidies for those technologies, they can be out of reach for those lacking generational wealth. "Let's prioritize figuring out how to make those benefits available to folks who don't have the capital to invest in them."

Climate plans will also create business opportunities and jobs, which the report says officials and the private sector should be sure to distribute fairly.

Beyond specific recommendations, the authors encourage city officials and businesses to generally track climate equity to ensure they're making progress. And they encourage advocacy groups, universities, and other large organizations to focus specifically on climate justice, too, using this report to launch a discussion.

"Take it from here," Longsworth said. "Do more research."

The Rev. Vernon Walker, a program director at Massachusetts-based nonprofit Communities Responding to Extreme Weather, praised the report.

"Racial justice and climate justice are inextricably linked. Communities of color are disproportionately harmed by racial injustice and climate injustice," he said. "We certainly do need more investment in climate resiliency in environmental justice communities as extreme weather is a threat to people and infrastructure, and I am delighted that this report mentions that."

Co-workers reflect on Loretta McLaughlin, famed Globe reporter

▶MCLAUGHLIN

1964 slaying that was part of the Strangler's murder spree.

Friends and co-workers of McLaughlin, who died in 2018, said her legacy as a journalist extends far beyond her investigation into the sensational crimes. As a reporter, she championed women's rights and drew attention to local and national failures to address the AIDS crisis. By the time she retired in 1993, McLaughlin had become The Boston Globe's editorial page editor.

In the film, a young McLaughlin's editor declares the first few murders a nonstory, citing the victims' lack of notoriety. She responds that their anonymity is exactly what makes the story worth chasing. A similar conversation played out in real life, McLaughlin wrote in the Globe nearly 30 years after the first murder.

"Why should anyone murder four obscure women," she wrote. "That was what made them so interesting ... sisters in anonymity, like all of us."

McLaughlin may have described herself as nearly anonymous, but her colleagues at the Globe remember her as "a force" — a larger-than-life reporter and a leading voice of the paper's editorial team.

"She was legendary," said Linda Matchan, who started at the Globe's Living Arts section in 1980, just a few years after McLaughlin arrived. "She scared the hell out of me."

When Matchan ended up sharing a table with McLaughlin at an awards dinner, she was initially concerned, unsure if the legendary journalist would even talk to her.

"She was so nice and warm, and when I got up to get the award, she just slapped me on the back," Matchan said with a laugh. "Forty years later and I still remember how much it meant to me that she seemed proud of me."

Janet Knott, a photojournalist who traveled with McLaughlin to Bangladesh and Mexico, said that after their trip she could always step into McLaughlin's office, "pick up my feet," and share a laugh or a source. Knott said she heard little about McLaughlin's work on the Boston Strangler case until she got to know McLaughlin as a friend.

"She was very humble," Knott said. "She wasn't walking around touting her past accomplishments."

Knott said McLaughlin was "supremely deadline-driven" and came into interviews with hours of preparation behind her. With other reporters, McLaughlin was welcoming and generous with her abundance of sources, despite her "no-nonsense" reputation, Knott said.

"Anyone that she coached she wanted to be as serious in journalism as she was, but still funloving," Knott said.

JANET KNOTT

Former Globe journalist Loretta McLaughlin perused the editorial pages in her backyard in Milton.

Loretta took a break from journalism in the mid-1970s, working as a science writer at Harvard University and managing public relations for the Massachusetts Eye and Ear Infirmary. From there, she went to the Boston Herald American before joining the Globe's staff in 1976.

She was keenly aware of the industry's discrimination against women, friends said, and became accustomed to advocating for herself.

"Loretta had a very sharp tongue, and I would say even sharper elbows," said Walter Robinson, who joined the Globe in 1972 and went on to lead the Globe's groundbreaking Spotlight investigation into abuses by the Catholic Church.

Robinson said he asked McLaughlin's advice whenever he covered an issue she was involved in, and she always had a connection — an address, a phone number — to pass along to younger reporters. She was unassuming, he said, and her smoking habit fit in well with the newsroom culture of the time.

"She had a great Boston accent," he recalled. "My memory of her is there was always smoke pouring out of her."

In 1991, McLaughlin took a new position as the associate editor of the Globe's editorial page. The next year, she became the paper's editorial page editor — a role in which she served for about a year until she turned 65, a mandatory retirement age for some Globe employees at the time. In that role, she wrote op-eds highlighting the AIDS epidemic in war-torn Rwanda, condemning the American health care system, and endorsing Bill Clinton for president.

Dan Wasserman, a longtime Globe cartoonist who worked with McLaughlin in her editorial position, said she was a "perfect" fit for the role. As an editor, she was "both supportive and hands-off" and was careful to ensure her editorials could speak and advocate for those without a megaphone of their own, Wasserman said.

"She liked using her journalistic skills and her perch on the editorial page to make stuffy people, entitled people, feel uncomfortable," Wasserman said. "She thought that was part of the job."

Wasserman has not seen "Boston Strangler," but said his former editor would probably feel vindicated to see her legacy honored, and also "tickled" to be portrayed by Knightley. Knightley's "aristocratic" vibe is "pretty far from the way Loretta presented," he said, laughing.

"She was tough, she was very frank," Wasserman said. "She was a tough newsroom gal in all the best senses."

Nelson Kiang, a Mass Eye and Ear researcher, dies at 93

▶KIANG

1989 interview with RLE Currents, a publication of MIT's Research Laboratory of Electronics.

"Even though science and medicine don't have the same mission," he added, "they do overlap somewhat."

Dr. Kiang, an auditory physiology pioneer who accomplished as much as he did partly because he famously needed little sleep, died March 19 in his Beacon Hill home. He was 93 and his health had been failing, said his son, Peter Nien-chu Kiang, a professor and director of the Asian American Studies Program at the University of Massachusetts Boston.

About 60 years ago, Dr. Kiang pioneered the understanding of how sounds are transformed into electronic impulses "that end up exciting the nerve fibers in the auditory nerve," said Charles Liberman, who succeeded his mentor as director of the Eaton-Peabody Laboratories, which he led from 1996 until 2022.

"He was the first person to really try to systematically describe what the rules are," Liberman said.

Working first with normal hearing, Dr. Kiang later focused on "damaged ears," Liberman added. "He was interested in what went wrong when we have hearing loss."

Dr. Kiang's research ultimately helped form some of the foundation for other research into hearing, including the design and refinement of hearing aids and cochlear implants, where scientists and engineers need to understand the auditory mechanics he studied.

Six decades ago, he also helped lead the way in using computers to store and analyze neuroscience data, so measurements could be studied "down to the microseconds," Liberman said.

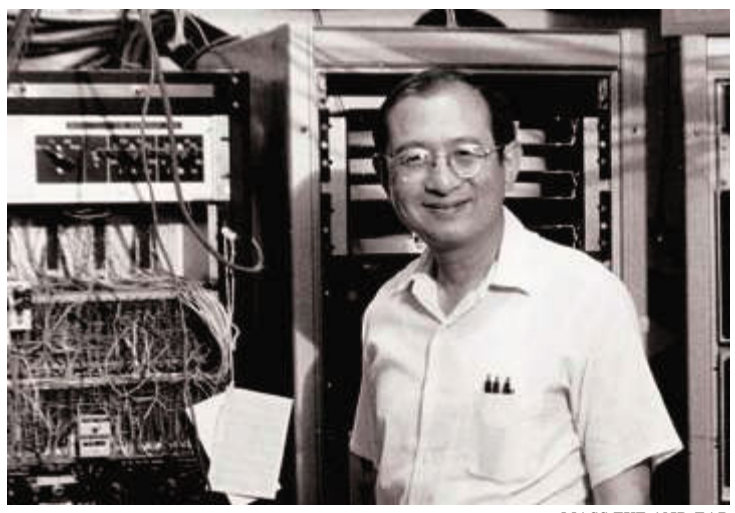
"And he was very passionate about scientific rigor and clarity of thought. He thought too many people looked at their data and saw what they wanted to see," said Liberman, who had studied under Dr. Kiang as a graduate student.

"An important aspect of him is that he prided himself on being brutally frank. That was part of his rigor and clarity," said Liberman said, who added: "I recognized him as the smartest guy I ever met."

Born in Wuxi, China, on July 6, 1929, Dr. Kiang was the second of three siblings whose parents were Yi-seng Kiang, a diplomat for the Republic of China, and Shih-ying Kiang, who managed the running of consulates at her husband's postings.

Dr. Kiang was 5 when his family moved to the United States, where he grew up in Los Angeles, New York City, and Seattle.

At the University of Chicago, he graduated in 1947 with a bachelor's degree, and in 1955, he received the first-ever doctorate in biopsychology, according to Harvard Medical School.



MASS EYE AND EAR

Dr. Kiang bridged divides between engineering and medicine as he broke ground in his research into how humans hear.

That year he joined the research staff at MIT's Research Laboratory of Electronics. Subsequently, he was the first appointment to the newly formed Eaton-Peabody Laboratories, which philanthropist Amelia Peabody, a former Mass Eye and Ear board member, helped establish.

Dr. Kiang directed the Mass Eye and Ear-based lab until 1996, guiding to world prominence its research into auditory mechanics and how to address hearing loss and deafness.

From his earliest days at the Research Laboratory of Electronics, he found a niche as someone who could conduct important research and bring together colleagues from different disciplines.

As Dr. Kiang told RLE Currents, he was fluent in the research languages of all his colleagues and could bridge the "big cultural difference between science and medicine then, which remains to this day. The duty of medicine is to care for sick people, and that of science is to find out how the universe works."

And because he had faculty appointments at MIT and Harvard Medical School, "I take two different views," he said of his research.

"At MIT, we tend to think of the brain as an information processing machine," he said. "At Harvard, we think of the brain as a wet organ full of active chemicals. Both views are correct, and by understanding both, one gains a more complex perspective."

Dr. Kiang's first marriage, to Madlyn Rowe, an administrative assistant, ended in divorce. They had one son, Peter.

He later married Barbara Norris, who had worked in the Eaton-Peabody Laboratories.

A service will be announced for Dr. Kiang, who in addition to his wife and son leaves a stepdaughter, Pamela Raab, a psychotherapist in New York City, and a grandson.

At one point, Dr. Kiang's habit of sleeping only four hours a night drew media attention.

"My father used to say I'd burn myself out. But since I made it to 60, he now says I've lived twice as long as most people," Dr. Kiang told the Globe in 1989, adding that he preferred watching TV to sitting in a movie theater because that allowed him to watch, eat, read, and converse with his wife simultaneously.

Dr. Kiang devoted many of his extra hours to reading the thousands of books that filled his Beacon Hill townhouse.

"Every inch was just piles of books and he read all of them," his son said. "So he was able to think about and talk about any topic — from any time period, from anywhere in the world, from the cell level to cosmology."

Peter said his father had set aside some 2,000 books to donate to the Boston Public Library's Chinatown branch, and hundreds more for the Josiah Quincy Upper School, which is under construction in Chinatown.

"He wouldn't use these words, but his love language was books," Peter said.

In recent years, Dr. Kiang was troubled by the rise in anti-Asian hatred and violence, the kind of bigotry he recalled from his boyhood, when he and others wore "I am Chinese" buttons after the attack on Pearl Harbor, as Japanese Americans were attacked and sent to internment camps.

During the pandemic, "he was a very vulnerable target, as a very slow-walking Asian elder," Peter said.

In an unassuming gesture, Dr. Kiang insisted that his portrait in Mass Eye and Ear's gallery of prominent figures reflect who he was. On a wall of many white men wearing suits and lab coats, "Nelson is in khakis and a shirt, pocket protector full of pens," Liberman said.

At the conclusion of the RLE Currents interview, Dr. Kiang spoke about his legacy as a researcher and a teacher.

"It's not so important for anyone to remember me as it is for them to support the ideas that I stand for," Dr. Kiang said.

"I don't think being remembered is nearly as important as imparting to students the values that one holds dear — the intellectual integrity, dedication to scholarship, and a sense of quality in one's work," he said. "I think that's the best legacy to leave them, and they should pass it on — like a virus that becomes part of our genetic heritage."

Restoration work brings a new spirit to Borden house

The site where prominent Fall River residents Andrew and Abby Borden were found murdered by a hatchet has served as a museum and popular bed and breakfast since 1995, according to the museum's website.

Restoration efforts began in the summer of 2021, according to Zaal. This included strengthening the foundation of the house, removing asbestos from the basement, and repairing a bulging wall along the house's stairs, as well as modernizing touches, such as smart locks and a new stove.

"A lot of the renovations didn't really disrupt [tours and overnight stays] at the house," Zaal said. "We did it during the winter, our slow period."

The house has long attracted ghoul lovers and ghost hunters hoping to experience a brush with the paranormal. While the home's floral wallpaper is pristine and the ornate furniture is new, the abundance of old-timey patterns, toy dolls, framed pictures of Lizzie Borden, and other knickknacks transport visitors to the late 1800s.

And then there are the ghosts. Andrew and Abby Borden are said to haunt the house, Zaal said, and many guests tell him they've seen a woman in a white dress.

Tour guide Ryk McIntyre claims he once saw a woman wearing a black, Victorian dress, hat, and veil while pulling his car into the parking lot behind the house. He noted Lizzie Borden often dressed that way, according to a book about her case. When McIntyre got out of the car, he said the woman had disappeared.

Most of the ghostly sightings, however, are reported in the basement, where McIntyre said a young girl once told him she saw the shape of an arm reaching out to her at the stairs.

But Zaal said restoring the home wasn't just about keeping a local tourist attraction open; it was an effort to preserve a piece of history that has fascinated the nation for more than a century.

Portraits of the sheriff investigating the case and news sketches of the trial displayed throughout the house also showcase how the justice system worked at the time, and the feminist politics at play behind Borden's defense, Zaal and McIntyre said.

"Besides bringing up the psychological element of the murders, there's aspects that have been brought up like class privilege, the interplay of gender," McIntyre said. "There's so many aspects to look at the case."

US Ghost Adventures has also created a Fall River ghost tour to showcase other parts of the city's history, according to Zaal.

"Fall River has some really incredible, interesting, and tragic history," Zaal said. "And we want to really tell that story of the city and kind of take a look at more than just the Lizzie Borden House."

The house currently has six bedrooms available for guests, as well as one bedroom in the basement that will open in the spring.

Zaal said the company is waiting for zoning approvals to continue renovating the house.

Now, the antique stove sits as display next to a new, modern stove.

"It doesn't pose a threat to burning down the house or a gas leak, and doesn't waste the local government's resources with having to send out a fire car," Zaal said. "That's just a matter of being a responsible business and a good neighbor."

Another change to improve the guest experience was switching the old mattresses in the bedrooms with new ones, Robinson said.

"We did that last year and I haven't heard a single complaint about our mattresses since then," Robinson said.

Ralph Borden, a Fall River native and relative of Andrew Borden's touring the home, said the renovations didn't take away from his experience, and he felt as if he was in the 19th century.

"The house still looks very authentic," Borden said, even with smart technology. "While it can seem out of place, it's for the better."

Zaal said restoring the house pays homage to the two victims and their stories.

"The great thing about this story is that people can listen to the facts, look at the house and how it's laid out," Zaal said. "Then come to a conclusion on their own about how a murder could have happened."

Cape Cod Canal closed for five hours to protect right whales center's Marine Animal Entanglement Response team removed around 200 feet of rope from the whale and attached a tracking buoy, but the animal is not yet free.

Researchers with the response team were monitoring the whale Sunday, but could not attempt to remove the remaining ropes until conditions, including rough waves and high winds, calmed, according to Amy Jenness, director of marketing, communications, and outreach at the Center for Coastal Studies.

Mayo said whales have entered the canal in previous seasons, but this year has seen "more canal action" than before. Mayo told the Globe Saturday that he believes there could be closer to 90 to 100 whales in the bay.

Right whales have aggregated in the bay during the winter since at least 1984, Mayo said, when he began his research, drawn in by the region's consistently high concentration of food.

"This is very much a nursery ground," he said. "It's probably a location where we see the highest concentrations of right whales of this species anywhere in the world."

He said right whales are "notorious" for swimming into shallow water — Mayo once worked with a whale that made it up the Delaware River — but researchers struggle to predict their individual behavior, since there are so few to study.

"When you get down to right whales, they live a lifestyle and live in areas that are really different than other whales," Mayo said. "They socialize in different ways. They feed in radically different ways."

Mayo said he typically sees whales that enter the canal turn around before making it all the way through.

Although, just a few weeks ago, he said, a year-old right whale crossed the entire length of the canal. Mayo called the trek "kind of extraordinary."

Jenness said the Center for Coastal Studies had no planes in the air Sunday and so could not capture a bird's eye view.

She also said that right whales do not typically swim all the way through the canal, which spans more than 17 miles, but there are exceptions.

"It depends on the food source, how deep into the canal the plankton has reached," Jenness said. "I don't think they like being in the canal, I don't think it's their favorite thing."

The canal also closed at the beginning of March, causing a backup of traffic. One whale entered from its western entrance, near Buzzards Bay; an hour later, three more whales entered the east side of the canal to feed.

Mayo said whales tend to exit the canal in a matter of hours, because the confined space is "not a good feeding area, that's for darn sure." He said more whales are likely to continue entering the canal as long as dozens remain near its entrance.

Jurassic World Live Tour brings 24 life-size dinosaurs to Boston

By Maddie Browning
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

The dinosaurs may have gone extinct 65 million years ago, but they're coming back — and going on tour — to Boston University's Agganis Arena.

Through Sunday, Bostonians can attend the Jurassic World Live Tour where dinosaurs from the popular films come to life. And, the live-action recreations have to meet Universal Studios' standards, according to one of the show's performers — or as they're known, dinoteers — Derek Rojan.

During the show, 24 film-accurate and life-size dinosaurs will stomp and run around the stage, all operated by the dinoteers.

The show's storyline sits in between the first two "Jurassic World" films on Isla Nublar where "scientists work to unravel a corrupt plan and save a new dinosaur from a terrible fate," according to a press release. That new dinosaur is Jeanie, a Troodon, which is a small theropod from the Late Cretaceous period, according to the Natural History Museum.

The show will also feature a familiar face: Blue, the velociraptor from the films who saves Owen Grady's (played by Chris Pratt) life.

The dinoteers operate the smaller dinosaurs, like Jeanie, by climbing inside them, and strapping a backpack connected to the dinosaur's interior around their shoulders and waist, said stunt performer Liz Kinder. Their feet are then attached to the dinosaur feet, and they have to carry about 120 pounds of weight while "running after people and doing fight choreo[graphy]," she explained.

Kinder said the larger dinosaurs, like the stegosaurus and triceratops, are driven onto the stage by someone inside the dinosaurs, and their movements are controlled by people off stage. The show's Tyrannosaurus rex is true-to-life, 40 feet in length, while the baby stegosaurus is over 400 lbs.

A lot factors into the planning of each dinosaur's movements "to bring out [their] personality," from figuring out how they run to expressing their emotions through neck manipulation, said dinoteer Carlos Caraballo.

Troodons were thought to be intelligent, according to National Geographic Kids. "So we tried to embody that by giving [Jeanie] finer movements than the raptors, which are way more vicious and a little more primal," Caraballo said.

The dinoteers tackle different roles depending on the performance: "One day I might be a soldier that's chasing after the heroes. One day, I'm a dinosaur chasing the bad guys around, and every now and then, I hop on a motorcycle, and I'm, again, one of the bad guys," said Kinder.

For parents concerned about their kids being scared of the dinosaurs, Kinder said they can expect an experience similar to watching the movie. "There is a bit of an adrenaline rush, and at the same time, you're completely safe," she said of the performance, which runs nearly two hours, including intermission.

Every ticketholder has the opportunity to attend the pre-show experience, starting one hour before the show, where they will be able to walk around the stage and get a closer look at a triceratops, a stegosaurus, and Bumpy, an herbivore from DreamWorks's series "Jurassic World: Camp Cretaceous." They will have a chance to take photos with the set, dinosaurs, and vehicles, including the serie's iconic Jeep and Gyrosphere, according to tour coordinator Tyler Hubbard.

"My favorite part [of the show] is we have a baby stegosaurus, when she comes out on the stage, the kids lose their minds, and it is the most heartwarming thing in the world," said Kinder. "When you're exhausted and backstage, and you just hear all these kids screaming, 'It's a baby stegosaurus!' it's amazing, and it's just really magical every time."

'The Glittering World' shines with A Far Cry

A FAR CRY
At Jordan Hall. Friday

Friday night at New England Conservatory's Jordan Hall, the Boston-based string orchestra A Far Cry did as many musicians do when introducing brand new material, and paired it with a standard. That A Far Cry now has certain pieces it can call standards at all is a milestone of maturity in itself, one that might feel a little jarring to longtime listeners — hang on, wasn't A Far Cry that joyfully scrappy DIY orchestra of freelancers rehearsing out of a storefront in Jamaica Plain? Breaking news: You got older and so did they, a baby born when the orchestra was founded will be old enough to vote in two years, and they still rehearse in that storefront in JP.

But even though A Far Cry has decisively established itself as a mainstay of the Boston musical community, something about it feels perpetually fresh with every performance. Take the standard the orchestra chose, Ted Hearne's "Law of Mosaics": Not a standard by the classical canon's definition, but a standard for A Far Cry itself. The ensemble commissioned "Law of Mosaics" from Hearne and premiered it in 2013, and it became the title piece of the critically acclaimed 2014 recording that launched A Far Cry to greater recognition outside Boston.

A few years before this piece premiered, a clip of Justin Bieber's "U Smile" slowed down by 800 percent set the Internet abuzz and (in my opinion) helped clear a path for an explosion of musical memes. A similar irreverent but good-natured spirit seemed to rule "Law of Mosaics." As its title suggests, the piece is made of chunks and shards of sound that are often directly sampled from other pieces. These usually, if not always, coalesced into a greater whole during Friday's performance.

Violinist Alex Fortes, that piece's concertmaster, led the orchestra in demonstrating a few of those samples before properly beginning the piece, which includes movements titled (for example) "Excerpts from the middle of something" and "Climactic moments from 'Adagio for Strings' and 'The Four Seasons' slowed down and layered on top of one another." This last one featured exactly what it said on the tin while "Palindrome for Andrew Norman" seamlessly strung together samples from sources ranging from Bach to Björk and made me wish I could listen again with an annotated guide on hand. Also like many Internet memes, the piece dragged on longer than was entertaining or interesting, but not too long after that occurred to me, it was over.

The concert's second half was dedicated to the debut performance of "The Glittering World," which the orchestra commissioned from Navajo composer Juantio Becenti. Becenti, who was born one year after Hearne, also wove several samples into his score: Dmitri Shostakovich's four-note musical signature here, and a song that Becenti said "every Navajo child grows up singing" there. But instead of the foundations of the piece, Becenti's samples were more like waystations along the piece's journey, which abstractly dramatized the Navajo creation myth.

Longtime A Far Cry violinist Miki Cloud played a crucial role as a soloist throughout the piece, but "The Glittering World" is not a traditional concerto. Cloud stood not in front of the orchestra, but embedded within it, and when the solo part diverged from the violin section, it was always in conversation with the orchestra at large. "The Glittering World" began with a busy shimmer of hope and wonder and ended in a similar place after several tension-filled detours. The first of these was led by the low strings, the next by the violins as Cloud matched and magnified long, razor-edged notes from the section players one by one.

The final turn into the sun came with the Navajo song, which the violins played with intentionally fuzzy intonation that evoked a chorus of schoolchildren. "The Glittering World" deserves the best that can be said about a new piece: It deserves repeated listening, and the repeated performances that make that listening possible.

Special kudos are due to Cloud, not only for shining in "The Glittering World" but for her leadership with the three high school students of the Project STEP Honors Quartet, which opened the concert with single movements from quartets by Haydn and Quinn Mason. With Cloud playing second violin, violinist Laura Licata, violist Alba Gilabert-Reid, and cellist Lorenzo Ye showed more comfort with ensemble playing and communication than I've seen from many conservatory undergraduates. It only makes sense — if they're learning that from A Far Cry, they're learning from the best. Now how about putting "The Glittering World" on the next CD?

STAGE REVIEW

SHADOWS CAST
Directed and choreographed by Raphaëlle Boitel. Lighting and set design by Tristan Baudoin. Original music by Arthur Bison. Presented by ArtsEmerson. At Emerson Paramount Theatre

Director and choreographer Raphaëlle Boitel, whose "When Angels Fall" in 2019 left Boston audiences gasping, returned to ArtsEmerson over the weekend for a too-brief run of "Shadows Cast," a stunning combination of sound, light, and movement delivered by six extraordinary performers.

To describe the movement simply as acrobatics diminishes the power of the lighting and music, which function as equal partners to the choreography in telling the story of one woman's efforts to move forward from a childhood trauma. The production opens with a young woman suspended high above the stage on a rope swing. She twists and turns and hangs from it, laughing as she begins to swing higher and higher. Anyone who has gone too high on a playground swing will immediately recall the contrasting feelings of exhilaration and terror, which sets the tone for what's to come here. Layered over her laughter is the memory of a dark secret — one she must confront to move on with her life.

From that first meeting with our protagonist — referred to only as K (Vassiliki Rossillion) — the world expands to encompass K's family, including a father, two sisters, a brother, and a brother-in-law, who come together for a wedding. The family pecking order is on full display, with the younger sister (Tia Balacey) and brother (Mohamed Rarhib) appearing slightly at arm's length from the central drama, and yet they can't help but be sucked into the complicated dynamics. Family drama ensues at the dinner table where raw emotions are on display. But what's most striking is that while the focus of the story is communication — or lack thereof — words are the least important element in this tale.

Dialogue is limited, tossed off as unimportant, or remains unspoken while glances and gestures are clearly fraught with discomfort, uncertainty, fear, and, occasionally, humor and affection. The physicality of emotions emerges in a demand for accountability, a rage that leads K to throw herself at her father while her family members use all their strength to force her back. As striking as these full body lunges are, the stoic stillness of the father (Alain Anglaret) is equally gripping.

The family gathering provides a frame for our journey into K's mind, one that is illuminated by cinematic techniques, including blocks of light that move with Arthur Bison's original music, allowing the performers to appear and disappear in choreographic patterns that are both hypnotic and disturbing. In one scene, a bride (Alba Faivre) and groom (Nicolas Lourdelle) take turns sitting in a chair to speak to a therapist who is concealed behind a wall of smoke. After the therapist offers advice that consists of indistinguishable grunts and moans, the couple step through the wall but are pushed back, with only the therapist's hand and arm emerging through the haze to reprimand them to stay on their side.

Those stark contrasts — between light and dark, humor and heartache, wispy memories and life's mundane realities — are the axis around which "Shadows Cast" pivots.

Together, these pieces add up to an emotionally potent theatrical experience. Boitel's storytelling and the circus routines are integrated so beautifully with Tristan Baudoin's brilliant lighting and set design they deepen the impact of this evening of theater in a way that will haunt you long after it ends.

Duvall's Monster effort boosts Sox

That Adam Duvall had three incredibly productive games at Fenway Park in 2020 while a member of the Atlanta Braves was not necessarily why the Red Sox signed him to a one-year contract in January.

Sox pitching was awful that season, and that's being charitable. Duvall, who had four homers in that series, was one of many opposing hitters who padded their statistics.

But here we are, three games into the season and it's clear Duvall will be best of friends with the Green Monster.

The new center fielder doubled twice and drove in two more runs Sunday as the Sox beat the Baltimore Orioles, 9-5.

Duvall, who had a walkoff home run Saturday, is 8 of 14 with three doubles, a triple, two home runs, and eight RBIs in three games.

Most righthanded hitters with power love Fenway. But Duvall now has 11 extra-base hits and 14 RBIs over seven games. There's something else going on.

"I feel like I see the ball pretty well and I like to pull the ball, so it's good to have [the wall] there," he said.

Duvall is the first player in Sox history to have six extra-base hits in his first three games for the team.

"It's definitely cool," he said. "It's a storied franchise that's been around for a long time."

Duvall hit .213 with a .677 OPS for the Braves last season and missed the final 10 weeks after injuring his left wrist running into a wall while pursuing a foul ball.

Tigers earn school's first crown in record fashion

DALLAS — Kim Mulkey had tears of joy streaming down her face as she guided LSU to it first national championship.

Her Tigers used a record offensive performance to beat Caitlin Clark and Iowa, 102-85, on Sunday and win the first basketball title in school history.

The victory made Mulkey the first women's coach to win national championships at two schools. She won three at Baylor before leaving for LSU two years ago.

"Coaches coach a lifetime and this is the fourth time I've been blessed," Mulkey said. "Never in the history of LSU basketball, men or women, has [anybody] ever played for a championship."

The feisty and flamboyantly dressed Mulkey, who wore a sparkly, golden, tiger-striped outfit, now has the third-most titles of all time behind Geno Auriemma's 11 and Pat Summitt's eight. Mulkey has never lost in a championship game.

"My tears are tears of joy," she said. "I'm so happy for everybody back home in Louisiana."

Clark, the Associated Press national player of the year, couldn't lead the Hawkeyes to their first national title despite one of the greatest individual performances in NCAA Tournament history. The junior finished with 30 points. She scored 40 in the semifinals to knock out unbeaten South Carolina one game after she had the first 40-point triple-double in NCAA history in the Elite Eight.

The dazzling guard, who grew up in Iowa, set the NCAA record for points in a tournament, passing the 177 that Sheryl Swoopes scored in 1993 en route to leading Texas Tech to the title that year. Clark ended her tournament with 191.

LSU's 102 points broke the previous high for a championship game, surpassing the 97 that Texas scored against Southern California in 1986.

Red Sox' recall of first baseball experiences brings back fond childhood memories

By Stan Grossfeld

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Big leaguers quickly melt into awestruck Little Leaguers when they talk about the first game they went to as a kid.

Red Sox second baseman Christian Arroyo remembers the exact day he fell in love with baseball.

"I went to a spring training game in Port Charlotte and I saw A-Rod hit a home run when he played for the Rangers," said Arroyo. "I can't remember who they were playing, but he hit a homer to left that I don't think has landed yet.

"And that's when I kind of fell in love with baseball."

Arroyo, age 5 or 6, was sitting halfway up in the left-field bleachers with his mom, his grandmother, and his aunt. His family went to a lot of spring training games and young Arroyo remembers the interactions he had with players.

"I got autographs from guys that were willing to give me an autograph," he said. "But besides that, I never really begged or anything. I was just kind of enamored with just being there.

"Now I try to always remember when I was a kid and the people that I wanted to sign for me didn't.

"I understand it now. Sometimes you got to go and you can't."

Third baseman Rafael Devers grew up in the small northern coastal town of Sanchez, Dominican Republic. His dad was his baseball hero.

"When I was a kid, 8 or 9, my dad played amateur ball and he took me to the field," Devers said. "It was a big deal in my small town because those games were very, very important in those neighborhood towns. I tried to be like a batboy; I carried the bats and tried to put on my dad's glove.

"I remember being very proud of watching my dad playing baseball and that's something that has always stuck with me."

Catcher Reese McGuire was 5 when he and his older brother Cash, 6, went to Safeco Field in Seattle. Their goal was to get a baseball.

"During batting practice, we brought our little Sports Authority gloves and I remember my dad would tell us, 'Hey, when you hold your glove up, make sure you yell, please,' " McGuire said. "All the other kids around us are like yelling, 'Here, here.'

Especially one that knocked the Blues out of playoff contention, on a back-to-back, with several big names (Patrice Bergeron, David Krejci, and Charlie McAvoy) out of the lineup.

Surviving a so-so third period, the Bruins (60-12-5) tied the 1976-77 Canadiens for the second-most wins in NHL history with a 4-3 shootout win at Enterprise Center. The record is 62 wins, accomplished by the 1995-96 Red Wings and 2018-19 Lightning.

CBA change to help Celtics keep Brown?

All-NBA team among factors

By Adam Himmelsbach

The NBA and the National Basketball Players Association reached a tentative deal Saturday on a new collective bargaining agreement which would run through the 2029-30 season.

From the implementation of a midseason tournament to a requirement that players take part in at least 65 games to be eligible for All-NBA teams, there will be some significant changes. But one shift related to salary structures could affect the Celtics in the near term.

Under the new agreement, players can sign veteran's extensions for 140 percent of their previous year's salary in the first year of a new deal, a significant bump from 120 percent. This could ultimately help Boston retain star forward Jaylen Brown.

Brown is finishing up the third season of the four-year, $115 million extension that began after his rookie contract expired in 2020. It was a slightly below-market deal for Brown,

At center spot, perhaps glimpse of future?

BRUINS NOTEBOOK

ST. LOUIS — Back in his adopted hometown as a head coach for the first time, Jim Montgomery pulled out his "cheaters" to read his reshuffled lineup sheet.

David Krejci and Charlie McAvoy were the latest Bruins to get a down-the-stretch rest, joining Patrice Bergeron on the metaphorical couch.

That meant the Bruins faced the Blues with a new No. 1 center (Charlie Coyle), a move to the middle (Trent Frederic), a new top defensive pair (Hampus Lindholm-Dmitry Orlov) and the deployment of little-used Jakub Zboril.

It worked out. In a 4-3 shootout win, Coyle was his physical, puck-possessing self and scored the shootout winner. Frederic (two assists) made his cheering section happy. Lindholm had an assist, and Orlov's would-be overtime winner was called back for offside.

Was this a look at the post-Bergeron, post-Krejci future for the Bruins, with Coyle, Pavel Zacha and Frederic holding down the top three center spots? That depends on how all three develop, and of course, when Bergeron and Krejci decide to trade composite sticks for shuffleboard cues.

While Coyle is one of the best third-line centers in the game, and the skilled Zacha has shown promise as a second-liner, the Bruins are still trying to determine Frederic's ceiling. The 25-year-old has grown under Montgomery's positive encouragement, his pair of assists Sunday giving him 16-14–30 in his third full season.

As a winger, Frederic has impressed Montgomery with his work on the walls. To be a viable center anywhere in the lineup, he has to improve his quickness in the defensive zone, with both foot speed and thought process.

Before puck drop Sunday, Montgomery was expecting Frederic to have lots of juice.

"I said, 'Freddy, you're starting,' so I'm sure the pits are going already," Montgomery said, chuckling. "He's a hometown kid. It's going to be exciting for him. He's going to get lots of ice. I'm sure he has a lot of friends and family here to see him."

Frederic's brother, Grant, said 20 to 30 members of Team Freddy filled a box at Enterprise Center.

"It goes a long way," his younger brother said of being asked to stand on the blue line for introductions. "It means a lot to someone like myself. Family members eat it up."

A top-line promotion for Coyle, who had Brad Marchand and Jake DeBrusk as his wingers, was another peek at what could come.

"We know Charlie Coyle helps us win every night," Montgomery said. "We want to put him in a situation and see what that might look like in the future.

"We have to start thinking about those things at some point."

Visiting the in-laws

It was a quick trip home for Montgomery, whose wife, Emily, is from here. He exchanged handshakes and backslaps with some 30 people after the game.

"More people than I do in my hometown of Montreal," he said before the game. "All the in-laws are in, and the neighbors."

Should they hold the team charter for him?

"No," he said. "I want to get home to my kids."

Montgomery's record-setting Bruins (60-12-5) bounced from playoff contention the Blues, who gave him a second chance at an NHL coaching career after his trouble in Dallas.

Montgomery, fired by the Stars in 2019, spent time running the Blues' power play (2020-21) and penalty kill (2021-22). He said he "grew exponentially" under coach Craig Berube. He learned how to be quick at practice, move from drill to drill without wasting time, and clearer in his communication.

Berube said Montgomery — "a smart hockey mind" — brought a lot of ideas, was honest, and that his positive nature rubbed off on everyone in the Blues organization.

"That is me," Montgomery said. "I like to look at the glass half full. I always have. I hate losses. I hate losing, like anybody else.

"But probably an hour after a loss, I'm ready to move on and see what we can learn from it and how we're going to get better. I don't like coming to the rink bringing everybody down. I like to try to get everybody up."

Ullmark moves up ranks

Linus Ullmark (38-6-1, 1.90, .937) tied Tiny Thompson (1929-30) for the second-most wins by a Bruins netminder. Pete Peeters (40 wins in 1982-83) holds the record . . . Montgomery said Krejci, who is dealing with lower-body issues, could not have played Sunday. That's in contrast to Bergeron, Marchand, McAvoy, and Lindholm, who have been rested on nights they could have suited up . . . Since playing in three games in four months (Nov. 17 to March 18), Zboril has played in every other game the last two-plus weeks. He had two assists in his last four outings . . . The Bruins caught up postgame with old pal Torey Krug (7-24–31 in 58 games), who scored in the third period . . . Former Bruins general manager Peter Chiarelli is the Blues' vice president of hockey operations.

"Never a doubt," Montgomery said as he walked off the ice and down the tunnel.

There hasn't been this season. They were tired, playing their fourth game in six nights, and made mistakes. They will do so in the playoffs. But they trust.

"Sometimes you've got to go the full 65-plus minutes," Ullmark said. "We know there's some things to be cleaned up . . . In the end, a win is a win."

The Bruins built on an opening strike (Jake DeBrusk) with two second-period goals in 76 seconds (Tyler Bertuzzi, Oskar Steen), taking a 3-1 lead after 40 minutes.

But the Blues steadily crept back into it, Jordan Kyrou scoring an extra-attacker goal with 24 seconds left to tie it at 3. Kyrou broke Ullmark's shutout late in the first, and ex-Bruin Torey Krug scored in the third to give the Blues life.

A Dmitry Orlov rocket at 2:22 of overtime was nearly the difference, but David Pastrnak was offside. Later in OT, Brad Marchand had the game on his stick on a full-length breakaway, but Jordan Binnington kicked out his bid.

Marchand temporarily played through a numb foot after a second-period shot block. He doesn't think he'll be another veteran to rest.

"I'd rather play the games and feel good going into playoffs," he said. "The more games I play, it's going to benefit me. I've missed enough this year."

At 5:51 of the first, DeBrusk got the Bruins off and rolling, finishing a two on one with Trent Frederic by cashing his own rebound. The winger broke out with speed, shot past a sliding Nick Leddy and was there, along with Frederic, to clean up the mess.

Though Frederic led the glove-bump train headed toward the bench, and DeBrusk pointed at him after the puck went in, DeBrusk (25th) was credited with the goal.

It was an eventful day for Frederic. The St. Louisan assisted on two goals, landed three shots, saw power-play time (1:13) and dropped Sammy Blais with a check that sent the Blues winger to the room for several minutes. Frederic, playing center in the absence of Bergeron and Krejci, made a few crafty plays and a few tired plays.

"It's really cool to be a part of," Frederic said of the 60th win. "Looking back, it'll be pretty cool to be a part of this team."

At 7:18 of the second, Bertuzzi scored his third as a Bruin (seventh overall) on a brilliant power-play feed from Pastrnak. The seam that was open, between Nick Leddy and Binnington, was a couple of skate lengths wide. From the wing, Pastrnak zipped a feed off Bertuzzi's feet.

"He's like a magician with a top hat," Montgomery said. "The rabbit comes out. He finds ways."

Bertuzzi's goal gave the Bruins' suddenly smoking power play its fourth goal in its last seven opportunities.

It was 3-0 at 8:02 of the second after Binnington kicked an A.J. Greer rebound to the slot, where Oskar Steen scored his first of the season in his second game of the year. He became the 26th different Bruin to put one on the board.

Ullmark stopped the first 21 shots he faced, using his glove to say "absolutely not" whenever the Blues challenged him. Kyrou beat him on an odd-man rush with nine seconds left in the second, giving the rink some life.

It remained a yawner until Krug jammed home a rebound at 9:47 of the third. Brandon Saad broke through the defense, and while Hampus Lindholm steered him wide, his rebound came to the slot.

The Bruins' penalty kill, working on a 28 for 28 streak (4 for 4), had 1:34 of a five on three to kill at 11:16 of the third.

Up by a goal, they killed both minors, allowing zero shots.

Like everyone in Black and Gold, Marchand will be dissatisfied if the Bruins don't win their last game of the year.

But even he acknowledged that win No. 60 was memorable.

"We've done a really good job of staying in the moment, but when the year's over and careers are over and you look back, it's special to be part of a group like this and break records," he said.

"Teams like this don't come together very often."

RED SOX NOTEBOOK

Houck's wife credited with save before first start

By Peter Abraham
GLOBE STAFF

Tanner Houck had a terrible spring training for the Red Sox, giving up 22 runs on 27 hits over 20⅓ innings.

"You want to say that spring training is for working on things, but I didn't pitch well," Houck said. "I was pretty upset about it before my wife reminded me that it didn't matter and to have a better attitude."

Credit Abby Houck with a save. Her husband worked five effective innings Sunday as the Sox beat the Orioles, 9-5.

Houck took a 3-0 lead into the fifth inning before the Orioles scored three runs on home runs by Adam Frazier and Cedric Mullins. The Sox picked up their starter with three runs in the bottom of the inning and Houck was credited with the win.

"He was around the plate with good stuff. He gave us a chance to win," Sox manager Alex Cora said. "A lot better than Florida."

That Houck walked one and struck out five was a positive, as was averaging 95 miles per hour with his fastball.

The righthander threw 45 of 70 pitches for strikes and worked inside effectively to Baltimore's lefthanded hitters.

"It's about just showing up each and every day and just putting your best foot forward," Houck said. "That's the best advice I'll give anyone regarding baseball or regarding life."

Crawford takes a turn

The Red Sox did not plan for Kutter Crawford to be in the rotation to open the season. But when Brayan Bello and James Paxton were slowed by injuries early in camp, he jumped into the mix and will face the Pittsburgh Pirates Monday night at Fenway Park.

Crawford made four starts and worked 17⅓ innings in spring training.

"It really helps that I had a normal spring training," the righthander said. "That wasn't the case before. I feel like I'm prepared."

Crawford pitched only five innings against Grapefruit League opponents last season, then allowed seven earned runs on 11 hits over seven innings in April working out of the bullpen.

This time he feels a lot better prepared.

"When [his] velocity is up, his other pitches play," Cora said.

"He's a guy who throws a lot of strikes and uses all his weapons, which is very important."

Crawford was 1-5 with a 5.43 ERA in 12 starts last season before missing September with a shoulder injury. The coaches felt he used that time wisely by learning from Nate Eovaldi, Michael Wacha, and the other starters.

"He watched a lot," Cora said. "He talked about the inside part of the plate. He needs to use that part of the plate to expand.

"Just being around the guys, not competing, just watching and learning was important."

Trip the light, fantastic?

The Red Sox celebrated Saturday's walkoff victory with a computerized light show made possible by the new LED lights installed over the winter.

That was certainly something new at tradition-bound Fenway Park.

"That was perfect timing. I was dying for that one," said Cora, who supports the idea of the Sox trying new things. "History is history and we respect that. This is Fenway Park. As an organization we've done an amazing job improving the facility and keeping what it means to all of us — not only the people here but in baseball.

"But you've got to catch up. In a sport that we want young people to come and enjoy it and have fun with it. I think we've done enough to get that atmosphere."

A highly unscientific Twitter poll taken during the game Sunday revealed that 40 percent loved it, 27 percent hated it, and 33 percent were somewhere in the middle.

Changeup in plans

Paxton was scheduled to make his next rehab start Tuesday for Triple A Worcester at Buffalo with Bello set for Wednesday. But with rain in the forecast for both days, Paxton and Bello are traveling to Fort Myers, Fla., Monday and will pitch there. Paxton is tentatively scheduled to start again in Buffalo Sunday . . . The Orioles did not attempt any stolen bases after going 10 for 10 in the first two games of the series. That they played from behind most of the game was a factor . . . Trevor Story is two weeks away from throwing as he recovers from elbow surgery and four weeks away from swinging. The infielder will stay in Boston for his rehab work when the Sox go to Detroit later this week . . . Designated hitter/corner infielder Justin Turner gifted his new teammates red boomboxes with Sox logos on the front. The boxes, made by Bumpboxx, are Bluetooth enabled, come with wireless microphones, and can be used as guitar amplifiers.

Tanner Houck showed much better form in his regular-season debut than he did down at Sox spring training.

repair a torn tendon sheath and it wasn't until late in spring training that he rediscovered his swing.

"To see that wall 81 times, hopefully plus, I think there's a comfort level for him," Sox manager Alex Cora said.

The Red Sox have scored nine runs in each of their first three games. The last team to score nine or more in its first three games was the 1978 Milwaukee Brewers with Stormin' Gorman Thomas.

"From top to bottom I think the quality of the at-bats have been great," Cora said.

Kiké Hernández was 2 for 4 with a homer and two RBIs. Masataka Yoshida was 2 for 4 with a walk, a stolen base, three runs, and two RBIs. Alex Verdugo had two hits, a walk, and drove in two runs.

The Sox had 14 extra-base hits in the series, taking two of three.

"It's been a lot of fun," Hernández said. "Basically doing what we expected ourselves to do as a unit. We're probably not going to average nine runs a game all year long but I do believe that's what we're capable of."

Tanner Houck had a two-hit shutout and 3-0 lead through four innings before giving up three runs in the fifth. Adam Frazier hit a two-run homer to right field and Cedric Mullins a solo shot to center.

The Sox came right back, scoring three runs in the bottom of the inning. Consecutive singles by Rafael Devers (a quiet 7 of 15 so far), Justin Turner, Yoshida, and Duvall rebuilt the lead to 6-3.

After Verdugo reached on an error, Christian Arroyo put down a sacrifice bunt to put runners on second and third. It proved to be a gift for the Orioles as reliever Bryan Baker struck out Hernández and got Connor Wong to ground out.

The Orioles rallied against Richard Bleier, who made his Sox debut in the seventh inning. Frazier singled and went to third on a double by Ramón Urias. Mullins followed with a two-run single.

The Sox added on again in the bottom of the inning. Yoshida singled and Duvall doubled before pinch-hitter Triston Casas delivered an RBI single. Hernández followed with a bloop single to right to score Duvall and the Sox had an 8-5 lead.

The Sox ran the bases effectively, turning soft hits into runs several times.

"We've got a complete team. We're going to use them," Cora said. "We're going to pinch hit for people, bunt, run the bases well."

Houck was the winner. Four relievers held the Orioles to two runs over four innings.

It's only three games. But the Sox can hit.

"We're going to be OK," Cora said. "That's something that we felt in spring training was going to happen and the quality of at-bats is going to stay there."

Zimmer first into Rays Hall of Fame

Tampa honors lifer, then finishes sweep

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Don Zimmer, a popular fixture in professional baseball for 66 years as a player, coach, manager — including four-plus seasons for the Red Sox from 1976 to 1980 — and executive, became the first person in the Tampa Bay Rays Hall of Fame.

Zimmer was honored in a ceremony before Sunday's game against the Tigers. He spent his last 11 years in the game, his longest stint with one team, as a Rays' senior adviser from 2004 until his death in June 2014 at age 83.

Zimmer's wife "Soot," whom he married at home plate during a minor league game in 1951, and his son Tom, a retired Giants scout, were among family members in attendance in St. Petersburg, Fla.

"It was a great honor . . . the Rays have been super," Soot Zimmer said. "I marvel when I think of the 66 years he was in the game, and he would come down every game and put the uniform on even when he a senior adviser. I can't imagine putting that uniform on everyday for all those years. To me, that was something,"

The formation of the Hall of Fame is part of a 25th anniversary season. Wade Boggs and Carl Crawford will also be inducted in ceremonies this year.

"Been around the game for so many years, and I think the Rays were incredibly fortunate to have him," Rays manager Kevin Cash said.

Zimmer played alongside Jackie Robinson for the only Brooklyn Dodgers team to win the World Series in 1955, was on the field with the original New York Mets, and was Joe Torre's right-hand man as the bench coach with the New York Yankees' most recent dynasty.

Springs goes six hitless

Starter Jeffrey Springs was pulled after six hitless innings, Riley Greene got Detroit's first hit with an infield single off Colin Poche in the seventh, and the Rays beat the Tigers, 5-1, to complete an opening three-game sweep.

Springs struck out a career-high 12 and matched his high of six innings. He threw 58 of 81 pitches for strikes.

"Sometimes we've got to protect them from themselves," Cash said of the pitching change. "Kind of gut-wrenching. I apologized to him, but I felt like sometimes we've just got to make some decisions that are best for the team."

Springs is a former reliever who spent the 2020 season with the Red Sox.

"Obviously as a competitor you want to pitch but it's not my job to look ahead and manage and all that," Springs said.

Detroit had just one runner against Springs: Nick Maton drew a two-out walk in the second.

Poche, Ryan Thompson, and Jalen Beeks pitched an inning each to complete a two-hitter. Beeks gave up Jake Rogers's homer leading off the ninth.

The three runs allowed by the Rays were the fewest through the first three games of a season in team history.

Stanton, Judge go deep

Giancarlo Stanton hit a 485-foot home run, Aaron Judge and Kyle Higashioka also went deep, and Jhony Brito won his brilliant major league debut as the Yankees beat the Giants, 6-0, in New York for their second shutout of the three-game series.

Brito yielded only two hits — one a bunt single — over five innings. He struck out six and walked one.

Rangers sweep Phillies

Marcus Semien drove in the go-ahead run with an RBI single and Josh Jung homered as the Rangers completed a season-opening series sweep of the defending NL champion Phillies with a 2-1 victory in Arlington, Texas.

Martin Perez (1-0) allowed one run in 5⅔ innings to win his season debut after setting career marks for ERA and strikeouts last season.

Bogaerts homers again

Xander Bogaerts hit a two-run homer, Seth Lugo pitched seven strong innings in his first start for his new team, and the Padres beat the Rockies, 3-1, in San Diego to salvage a series split.

Bogaerts, a new fixture in the powerhouse Padres lineup, has homered twice and drove in five runs on six hits in 13 at-bats in the first four games. He has homered in two consecutive games.

Senga wins Mets debut

Kodai Senga struck out eight in his MLB debut, leading the Mets over the host Marlins, 5-1. The lefthander allowed one run on three hits and three walks in 5⅓ innings.

Tommy Pham homered, doubled, singled, and drove in three runs for New York.

Garrett Whitlock features a more serious expression while stretching at Red Sox camp than he did while enjoying life as a Little Leaguer in Georgia.

Fond first experiences with baseball

▶BASEBALL

And we're like, 'Please.' And we saw this one guy pump-fake to the guys going, 'Here, here.' And he goes, 'Hey, you said please.'

"He threw it, and we caught it and it was cool. It was like our first experience in big-league baseball. It was probably a pitcher shagging flies but to my eyes it was like, oh, this guy is the best in the business."

Infielder Bobby Dalbec grew up a huge Mariners fan in Seattle, too.

"My first game I was probably 3," he said. "My dad worked with Atlantic Records and we had seats from the record label at Safeco. My dad was friends with one of Griffey's best friends."

He met Ken Griffey Jr. many times.

"I have like a bunch of balls and he personalized a picture of him, like finishing a swing. It says, 'To Bobby, keep swinging.' Yeah, it's really cool. Like super special."

Dalbec says he knew way back when he'd be a baseball player.

"Yeah," he said. "I've never seen myself doing anything else."

Shortstop Trevor Story grew up in Texas. His first game was a doozy.

"I was at the game that had probably the most difficult catch in baseball history, the Gary Matthews Jr. catch," said Story of his trip to Ameriquest Field in Arlington in July 2006.

"I was 13 years old. There was a ball hit to center and he was running toward the wall and he scales the wall and snatches the ball without even looking at it.

"I remember seeing that and just being amazed at how he caught that ball. We were sitting in left field with my dad, so we had a good line on it from left field looking toward center and we could see how he did it."

Story reenacted that play over and over in the backyard.

"Oh yeah, for sure," he said. "I played a little center field as a kid. Center field and short, those were my two spots bouncing back and forth."

In 2003, the Expos played 22 home games in San Juan. Kiké Hernandez, then 11, went to a game against the Mets with his dad.

"I got to go watch [Hall of Fame second baseman and Puerto Rico native] Roberto Alomar play," Hernandez said. "It was awesome because growing up in Puerto Rico we didn't have a big-league team.

"I didn't try to get any autographs or any balls. Where we were sitting I didn't really have access to the players, but yeah, I probably thought I wanted to play like Alomar. It was a great day, I was in awe of it all."

After taking a stern stance at the plate as a boy in Puerto Rico, Kiké Hernandez now can smile when outside of a big-league batter's box.

It was apparent early on that Bobby Dalbec would join the Red Sox.

As a major league pitcher, Corey Kluber was no fan of Texas's Ballpark in Arlington.

"It was hot, and the bullpen was all concrete and you'd bake in it," he recalled.

But his perception as a kid was totally different.

"I remember going to a Rangers game in like second grade and being in awe of how big everything was and then watching batting practice and seeing how far guys hit it," he said.

"It was hot but I didn't care about how hot it was at all. I think you're used to watching people on TV and then you get an opportunity to go watch them in person. I think it kind of takes that kind of awe factor to another level."

Outfielder Masataka Yoshida was a second grader when he went to his first game with his family in the Tokyo Dome.

Speaking through an interpreter, he says he didn't sing team songs or swing flags or hit plastic bat noisemakers, which are common for fans in Japanese baseball.

"No, I was just watching the game, laid back," he said. "I didn't have a specific team to cheer for. I didn't have a specific player. But I loved the home run, and I was watching the home runs in the game."

As a 7- or 8-year-old he had no idea what the future would bring.

"[Baseball] was something that I wanted to do, but it wasn't really realistic for me at the time," he said. "It was, like, kind of a dream."

Closer Kenley Jansen is from Curaçao.

"My first sporting event was in 2002," he said. "I think I was 14 at that time. My brother Ardley was playing with the Atlanta Braves [organization] and we went and watched spring training games [at Walt Disney World]. And I think that was the best thing ever in my life, watching guys like Chipper Jones and Andruw Jones play.

"Every kid in Curaçao loved Andruw because he grew up there. It just makes you have that moment, like, why not me? And even better it makes you a believer that you can dream even bigger. That day, Andruw and Chipper hit back-to-back homers. It was awesome."

Pitcher Garrett Whitlock's first game was Phillies vs. Braves at Turner Field in Atlanta.

"I was probably 6," he said. "We sat in the nosebleeds, got a hot dog. It was great. There [I] was with Chipper, Javier López, freaking Rafael Furcal. it was a fun Braves team to grow up watching."

His biggest surprise?

"Probably just the size of the stadium. I mean, at 6 years old, it looks like it was a [dang] city in there. And then in the old Turner Field they had the little mist run, you could run the bases through the mist and everything. So I was having a blast. I was just soaking it all in."

Pitcher James Paxton grew up just outside of Vancouver. When he was 11, his family made a pilgrimage to a Mariners game. It was a five-hour round trip across the border.

"So the game went into extra innings," said Paxton. "My brother and I were just begging my parents to let us stay."

They all moved down into the box seats.

"And it was like the 12th inning, bases were loaded and Ichiro came up. We were all chanting Ich-eee-ro and Ichiro got a walkoff walk. We were all excited and then got in the car and drove back home to Canada after the game. We were just pumped up."

Justin Turner says the first game he went to was at Cal State Fullerton, his alma mater.

"My dad grew up with one of the coaches there," he said. "So I got to go down to the dugout, hang out with the guys, go to practice with them, hit in the cages with them. I was 7 or 8?"

When he was 11, he became the bat boy for the next three years. He worked with three players who later logged 41 combined years in The Show: Mark Kotsay, Aaron Rowand, and Reed Johnson.

"Those three guys are kind of my favorite guys to watch," he said. "And then, ironically, I ended up playing in the major leagues against all three of them. They all said the exact same thing: 'I feel old.' "

Turner says now he feels the same thing.

"Crazy enough, when I played at Cal State Fullerton, Matt Chapman [Toronto third baseman] was actually my bat boy, and now he's playing in the big leagues and we're playing against each other," he said. "So it's kind of cool."

Change to help Celtics?

▶CELTICS

who has since made two All-Star teams.

Under the current CBA, Brown would be able to sign a four-year extension this summer for about $170 million. But Brown would be able to command more than that in the open market as a free agent in 2024, so there was no incentive for him to consider this option.

Now, Brown will be able to agree to a four-year extension worth closer to $190 million, essentially a full max salary. And by doing it this summer rather than waiting until next year, he would lock in that hefty figure.

But Brown's ambitions are certainly loftier. If he makes an All-NBA team this year, he will become eligible for a five-year, $290 million super-max extension.

It appears more likely than not Brown will secure a third-team All-NBA nod. He is averaging 26.7 points, 6.8 rebounds, and 3.4 assists per game and has helped the Celtics to the second-best record in the NBA. And, perhaps most important, his competition at forward has been decimated by injuries and absences, with players such as Kevin Durant, Anthony Davis, and Zion Williamson missing significant time.

On the surface, it may be fair to wonder whether Brown is deserving of a super-max deal worth 35 percent of the salary cap. He'd be 28 by the time another extension kicks in, and this season the Celtics have actually been 3.8 points per 100 possessions better with him off the court. By comparison, they are 5.8 points per 100 possessions worse when fellow All-Star Jayson Tatum sits.

But the NBA is expected to sign a massive new media rights deal that goes into effect in 2025 and subsequently causes the salary cap to increase at a maximum of 10 percent per year. As salaries mushroom, long-term deals look better.

When Brown was asked last week about the impact All-NBA voting could have on his future, he sounded like someone who did not want to get his hopes up.

"I just come out every night and play basketball," he said. "A lot of stuff is out of my control and it is what it is at the end of the day. I understand how the game works. It's not always about who are the best players. Sometimes it's a little bit political and it depends on whoever feels comfortable voting with."

Brown's comments in recent interviews raised questions about whether he even viewed Boston as a long-term home. He told The New York Times that he viewed segments of the fan base as "problematic" and toxic. And he made it clear to The Ringer that his future in Boston seemed uncertain.

"We'll see how they feel about me over time and I feel about them over time," he said. "Hopefully, whatever it is, it makes sense. But I will stay where I'm wanted. I will stay where I'm needed and treated correct."

Brown has been a frequent subject of trade rumors, most recently when Durant requested a trade from the Nets. And he has bristled when it's been suggested that he is Boston's "1B" behind Tatum.

Perhaps he has interest in going somewhere he can be the top dog. But the Celtics remain among the favorites to win an NBA title this spring, and Brown is central to that goal.

The situation will sort itself out in time, but for now, the Celtics at least have one more tool in their chest with which to work.

MEN'S COLLEGE BASKETBALL NOTEBOOK

San Diego St. brings fabulous memories

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Thirty years ago, a group of disrupters with baggy shorts and black socks changed college basketball as we know it, and took a good slice of American culture along for the ride.

Those freshmen known as the Fab Five ended up one win short of the title, which is exactly where San Diego State — a team coached by a former Fab Five assistant, Brian Dutcher — finds itself in 2023 during another transformative period in college hoops.

The Aztecs (32-6) themselves certainly aren't trying to deliver change to the game or the culture when they face UConn (30-8) in the title game Monday.

But the fact that they're here — a team with Michigan bloodlines that was forged quickly through the newly liberated transfer portal and enriched by opportunities that have sprung from name, image, and likeness deals — speaks volumes about where those Fab Five superstars were trying to take the game three decades ago.

"We got to college and started understanding the hypocrisy in the game, with the schools making millions and us sitting around poor as hell," said Fab Five guard Ray Jackson. "We wanted to change the dynamics of that, get the athletes feeling empowered a little more."

One of the greatest ironies is that the coach who essentially built the 21st-century version of San Diego State is Dutcher's longtime boss at both Michigan and SDSU, Steve Fisher. Fisher made his way to the West Coast after losing his job at Michigan in the wake of one of the most complex and sordid illicit-benefits scandals in NCAA history.

In essence, the coach, who retired and handed over the SDSU reins to Dutcher in 2017, got caught up in a series of events that, frankly, wouldn't be frowned upon nearly as harshly today. Back then, it was a shady booster with gambling ties trying to funnel money to players. These days, sports gambling is legal in many states (the NCAA brought the Sweet 16 to Las Vegas for the first time last week), while everyone from car dealers to social media conglomerates pays players in the open.

Fisher is in Houston, hanging with his son, Mark, a special assistant for the fifth-seeded Aztecs who has ALS.

"I had the ability to close my eyes and dream, and dream of this, to be honest with you," Fisher said last week.

A Final Four wasn't so much a dream as an expectation for the Fab Five — Jackson, Jalen Rose, Chris Webber, Juwan Howard, and Jimmy King — who, in many opinions, remain the most electric single recruiting class in college history.

They showed up at Michigan in 1991 and made not one but two appearances in the national title game. They got blown out by Duke 1992 with Bobby Hurley, the brother of current UConn coach Dan Hurley, doing some of the damage. In 1993, it was Webber's costly timeout when the Wolverines didn't have one that made the difference in a close loss to North Carolina.

So, no title, but the Fab Five ended up with more — namely, they opened the world to embracing the style they brought to the playground, while making an indelible statement about the way they felt college players should be treated.

"It could get frustrating and un-fun at times," Jackson said. "We just wanted to be transcendent. We wanted to bring the culture we came from, which was street basketball, community basketball, and bring that fun back to game."

They also ended up as successes after college, building careers in worlds as diverse as nonprofit, finance, TV, and even coaching; Howard just finished his fourth season as coach of the Wolverines.

"Isn't that the end goal, when the ball stops bouncing, you're doing something that's productive with your life?" said Dutcher, who has heard from everyone in the group during his program's first Final Four run.

In many ways, Dutcher's group came together in the polar opposite fashion as the Fab Five. San Diego State's starters came from different places at different times. They could separate themselves from the Michigan greats in another way if they can win the title that eluded Dutcher & Co. for all those years.

Simpkins new coach

American University named George Mason assistant Duane Simpkins as its coach. Simpkins, a DeMatha Catholic High product, starred at the University of Maryland before a professional career largely played overseas . . . Providence College suspended guard Alyn Breed after he was charged with pointing a gun at his girlfriend and other crimes over the weekend. Major David Lapatin of the Providence Police Department said Breed wielded the gun during an exchange with his girlfriend in an offcampus apartment early Saturday, The Providence Journal reported. He also is accused of taking a cellphone, driving someone's car without permission, and vandalism.

Bucks: Two-game lead over Celtics

Giannis Antetokounmpo had 33 points, 14 rebounds, and 6 assists and the Bucks beat the 76ers, 117-104, at Milwaukee Sunday night to move a step closer to the top playoff seed in the Eastern Conference. The Bucks (56-22) have a two-game lead over the Celtics (54-24) with four games left. The Celtics won the season series and own the tiebreaker. Philadelphia (51-27) is third in the East. The Bucks bounced back three nights after a 140-99 home loss to the Celtics that matched their most-lopsided defeat of the season. The Bucks never trailed thanks to a blistering start that enabled them to build a 31-15 lead. Joel Embiid had 28 points for the 76ers.

LeBron, Lakers in control

Anthony Davis scored 40 points, LeBron James had 18 points, 11 assists, and 10 rebounds to tie Jason Kidd for fourth place with his 107th triple-double and the Lakers routed the Rockets, 134-109, at Houston. The Lakers (40-38) moved two games over .500 and into a tie for seventh with New Orleans in the Western Conference with four games to go . . . Kevin Durant scored 35 points and the Suns held off the host Thunder, 128-118, for its fifth straight win.

GOLF

Conners rules Texas again

Corey Conners won the Valero Texas Open for the second time in five years for his second PGA Tour title, closing with a 4-under-par 68 for a one-stroke victory over rookie Sam Stevens at San Antonio. Also the 2019 winner, Conners had a 15-under 273 total on TPC San Antonio's Oaks Course. The Canadian now heads to the Masters, where he tied for sixth last year, his second straight top-10 finish at Augusta National. Stevens shot a 66. Sam Ryder (66) and Matt Kuchar (68) followed at 13 under. Patrick Rodgers saw a chance for his first tour victory and first Masters spot slip away. He shot a 73 to finish fifth at 11 under.

Koepka multiple LIV champ

Brooks Koepka became the first multiple winner in LIV Golf when he closed with a 3-under-par 68, making a 4-foot par putt on the final hole for a one-shot victory over Sebastian Munoz at Orlando. Koepka and 17 other players in the Saudi-funded league now go to Augusta National for the Masters.

Yin 2nd Chinese LPGA winner

Ruoning Yin became the second Chinese winner in LPGA Tour history, holding off England's Georgia Hall in the DIO Implant LA Open at Palos Verdes, Estates, Calif. Yin, 20, closed with an eventful 1-under-par 70 for a one-stroke victory over Hall. Recently retired Shanshan Feng is the other only other Chinese champion. Patty Tavatanakit (65) of Thailand and South Korea's Hyo Joo Kim (71) tied for third at 12 under. American Nelly Korda (67) and Spain's Carlota Ciganda (66) were 11 under.

AUTO RACING

Larson breezes at Richmond

Kyle Larson pulled away on a restart with 14 laps to go and easily won the NASCAR Cup Series race at Richmond Raceway. Larson started the final green flag run with Hendrick Motorsports teammate Josh Berry to his outside and beat Berry into the first turn. Berry, who is filling in for the injured Chase Elliott, held on for second, followed by Ross Chastain, Christopher Bell, and Kevin Harvick.

Verstappen wins Australian GP

Red Bull's Max Verstappen claimed his first Australian Grand Prix in remarkable circumstances in a chaotic Formula 1 race filled with drama from the green light to the checkered flag. Lewis Hamilton finished second. Although Red Bull's first triumph in Melbourne since 2011 was expected, the carnage that unfolded in the latter stages of the race made it an extremely hard-fought triumph. Verstappen appeared to be coasting to victory with an eight-second lead when debris from Kevin Magnussen's Haas forced the second of three red flags issued in the race with three laps remaining. On the restart, Verstappen was able to hold Hamilton to the first turn as bedlam unfolded behind his RB19, sparking a massive reshuffle of the finishing order in the 58-lap race.

SOCCER

Man U is sinking quickly

It wasn't long ago Manchester United was being talked up, somewhat optimistically, as a potential outsider for the Premier League title. Now, even a top-four finish is looking far from assured for a club up for sale and seeking Champions League qualification as another attraction for potential buyers. United's 2-0 loss at Newcastle further intensified the race for the two likely spots behind Arsenal and Manchester City, the Premier League's runaway top two, in Europe's top competition next season. Second-half goals by Joe Willock and Callum Wilson gave Newcastle partial revenge for its loss to United in the English League Cup final Feb. 26 and lifted the Saudi-controlled northeast team into third place, above United on goal difference. Tottenham is a point behind both teams in fifth place ahead of its game at Everton Monday.

MURPHY, Katherine "Kay"

Beloved Rockporter

1928 - 2023

Kay Murphy, an adored member of the Rockport community for more than 60 years, died on March 29. She was 94.

Mrs. Murphy served on the town Select Board, the School Committee and the Recreation Committee, and for many years provided a special brand of encouragement to generations of youngsters as a permanent substitute teacher in the Rockport public schools.

Mrs. Murphy, the mother of seven children, was universally loved in Rockport, where she arrived in 1962 with her husband, the late Boston Globe columnist Jeremiah V. Murphy, and their six children. Another would be born in Rockport.

Mrs. Murphy was relentlessly pleasant to all she encountered, whether in town hall, school hallways or the tennis court, where she helped organize summer tennis matches for a group of women for decades.

Mrs. Murphy had a smile for everyone, and an ability to bring out the best in those with whom she crossed paths. Blessed with a sunny disposition and incurable optimism, she was a welcome addition to any gathering. "She loved her family, the town of Rockport, and politics, from the local level to the national," said her children.

Mrs. Murphy was a lifelong Democrat, beginning as a little girl when President Franklin D. Roosevelt rallied the country during the Great Depression. She belonged to the Rockport Democratic Town Committee for many years and actively campaigned for a range of candidates, including President Barack Obama, Senator Elizabeth Warren and Congressman Seth Moulton.

Mrs. Murphy's mind was razor sharp. Reading the Boston Globe cover to cover was a daily ritual. She also read the Gloucester Daily Times and the Salem News. Few of life's twists and turns prompted Mrs. Murphy to frown, but a missed delivery of the newspapers was one of them. Mrs. Murphy avidly followed national politics and was especially interested in the advancement of women into the highest levels of government.

Mrs. Murphy was a great supporter of the Rockport Public Library. In her later years, the library returned the favor by taking it upon itself to weekly delivery several books, mostly novels, to Mrs. Murphy. She read them all.

As a permanent substitute teacher, Mrs. Murphy tended to give attention to students who were not accustomed to being noticed by teachers. Later, she viewed her years teaching as a privilege: "I got to meet so many kids!"

Mrs. Murphy grew up in Ipswich in a household where Polish was spoken. She was a popular student, making friends with virtually all of her 50 classmates in the class of 1946. In high school, Mrs. Murphy played on the basketball team and performed in student stage productions. She occasionally took the train to Boston to watch Ted Williams play left field at Fenway. She attended Salem State University (then College), graduating with the class of 1951.

By then, she had met a handsome young Navy vet with twinkling blue eyes from nearby Beverly. They married in 1950, as Jerry began his career as a sports reporter for the Beverly Times. Jerry and Kay moved on to Hyannis, then Rhode Island, as Mr. Murphy advanced to the Cape Cod Times and Providence Journal. Mrs. Murphy taught fourth grade in the public schools in Rhode Island one year, but soon the couple had four children under age 6.

After Mr. Murphy landed his dream job with the Boston Globe, the couple bought a big old house in Rockport. They later added an addition to help accommodate what had grown to be a family of nine. Their house was the scene of many joyous occasions.

As Mr. Murphy enjoyed great success as a columnist, Mrs. Murphy thrived in Rockport, then a community of less than 5,000. She was a great supporter of her husband's work; he periodically praised her in print as his "Katherine Mary." At one time,

O'GRADY, John "Jack"

Age 86, treasured husband and father, died Monday, March 27, 2023, in Easton, PA, surrounded by his loving family.

Jack is survived by his wife of 57 years, Betsy (née Hickey) of Hackettstown, NJ; and his two children, Brian, wife, Jana of Newtown, PA and Chris, wife, Shannon of Northampton, PA; as well as his two grandchildren, Riggins and Teagan O'Grady.

Born in Framingham, MA, to parents Thomas O'Grady and Anna O'Grady (née Donahue), Jack was the youngest of three brothers, Thomas and Gerald, who predeceased him.

Jack and his family resided in Berkeley Heights, NJ from 1970 through 2018 before moving to Hackettstown, NJ.

Jack attended Bates College in Lewiston, Maine, where he graduated in 1959 with a degree in economics and was captain of the basketball team.

Upon graduation, Jack served four years as an officer in the U.S. Navy, stationed on the USS Hammerberg destroyer.

Jack had many successes professionally, most notably working in sales and marketing for Fieldcrest Cannon/Pillowtex and as a consultant for Fine Art Limited. He was instrumental in the execution of company Olympic licensing agreements for the 1996 Atlanta and 2002 Salt Lake City games.

Family was everything to Jack. He cherished vacations that included summers at Long Beach Island, ski trips across the country, and trips to national parks.

Jack's philosophy was, "the more the merrier". He happily hosted guests at his lovely home and cherished the role of 'grillmaster', introducing friends and family to culinary delights, including Tuscan steak, and showing off his bocce skills.

Married since 1966, Jack and Betsy enjoyed their many adventures together, whether it be international travel or simple local pleasures.

Jack was a wise and gentle man, a patient teacher and a loyal friend. He cared deeply for his family and his love will remain a great and lasting gift in our lives.

A celebration for Jack will be announced at a later date.

Mr. Sakamoto, one of Japan's most prominent composers, pictured in 2018.

Ryuichi Sakamoto, 71, eclectic composer

By Tim Greiving
WASHINGTON POST

Ryuichi Sakamoto, an eclectic Japanese composer who was an early leader in electronic pop music and became an acclaimed composer of film scores — notably "Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence" and the Oscar-winning "The Last Emperor" — that blended Eastern and Western cultural influences, died Tuesday at 71.

The death, from cancer, was announced on his website, but no further details were immediately available. He had been treated for throat cancer in 2014 and rectal cancer in 2021, and he announced in 2022 he had been diagnosed with Stage 4 of an unspecified form of cancer.

Mr. Sakamoto founded the Yellow Magic Orchestra in 1978 with Haruomi Hosono and Yukihiro Takahashi, inspired by the German electronica group Kraftwerk, and it soon emerged as Japan's top-selling band. (Takahashi died in January.)

Popularly known as YMO, the orchestra perfected a witty robotic pop that attracted legions of teenage fans in Japan and influenced the sound of everything from Nintendo video game scores to the techno genre and hip-hop.

YMO had dance-floor hits in the United States with the funky synth tracks "Firecracker" and "Tighten Up," which toyed with ancient Eastern musical sounds and new technology. They earned a spot on "Soul Train" in 1980, where they played "Tighten Up" and their popular song "Computer Game."

Fans included Duran Duran and producer Todd Rundgren, and their song "Behind the Mask" was covered by Eric Clapton and Michael Jackson. "We were very big," Mr. Sakamoto told Britain's Guardian newspaper in 2008. "That's why I hated it. We were always followed by paparazzi."

The band broke up in 1983, and Mr. Sakamoto became a prolific solo artist with forays into acting.

He played a Japanese prison guard opposite another musician, David Bowie, in the World War II drama "Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence" (1983). Mr. Sakamoto agreed to take the role only if he could score the movie as well, and he composed a stutter-step main theme that combined an Eastern pentatonic scale with French impressionism for a strikingly catchy result.

"I tried to make a Christmas song, because it's a Christmas film," he explained to the London Daily Telegraph in 2017. "But it's also a fantasy story — a meeting of Western and Eastern gods — so I wanted it to sound exotic to both Western and Eastern ears."

The score, which featured synthesizers anachronistic for the film's historical setting, earned Mr. Sakamoto an award for best movie score from the British Academy of Film and Television Arts.

Filmmaker Bernardo Bertolucci hired Mr. Sakamoto to co-score the 1987 epic "The Last Emperor" alongside David Byrne of Talking Heads and the Chinese composer Cong Su. Mr. Sakamoto's main theme was a 70-millimeter-sized melody full of romance and nostalgia.

The composers shared an Academy Award and a Grammy Award for their soundtrack score. The film, in which Mr. Sakamoto played a Japanese officer and ally of the emperor, also collected the best picture Oscar.

Mr. Sakamoto reunited with Bertolucci on "The Sheltering Sky" (1990), starring John Malkovich and Debra Winger as a couple traveling in North Africa amid marital ennui, and again on "Little Buddha" (1993). Madonna cast him as a director in a music video within a music video for her 1993 song "Rain."

But Mr. Sakamoto was far more comfortable behind the screen. He scored approximately 50 feature films, documentaries, and television projects — including "Wuthering Heights" (1992) starring Juliette Binoche and Ralph Fiennes, the 1993 miniseries "Wild Palms," produced by Oliver Stone, and "Snake Eyes" (1998) and "Femme Fatale" (2002) for director Brian De Palma.

In 2015, filmmaker Alejandro Iñárrito asked Mr. Sakamoto to write music for his survivalist film "The Revenant," starring Leonardo DiCaprio as a frontiersman staving off vicious bears and the elements in the early 19th century.

Working with the German musician Alva Noto, Mr. Sakamoto used cold synthesizers and layers of sound and approximated slow, heavy breaths for this story about a man's return from near death.

Shortly before taking the assignment, Mr. Sakamoto said he had recovered from throat cancer and said the sounds he created for "The Revenant" were influenced by what he called "the closest moment to death in my life."

Ryuichi Sakamoto was born in Tokyo on Jan. 17, 1952. His father was a prominent editor.

"I remember our house was always full of writers, poets, and creative people who were sort of outcasts in Japanese society, sitting around talking and drinking all night," Mr. Sakamoto told the Times of London. "I was very conscious of being different from other people; it felt natural to be different."

His mother designed women's hats and played the piano, exposing him to classical music from infancy. Mr. Sakamoto started playing piano when he was 3 and was writing music at 10. He grew up on a steady diet of Western culture, from TV westerns to the Beatles, but he also gravitated toward the daring work of composer John Cage and French New Wave films.

During high school in the 1960s, he attended anti-Vietnam demonstrations and jazz clubs, forming a band with his friends to play bossa nova and Miles Davis music.

In the mid-1970s, at what is now Tokyo University of the Arts, he received a master's degree in music composition but also became intensely devoted to the study of electronic and ethnic music.

For his many solo albums, Mr. Sakamoto used the term "Neo Geo" to describe a musical melting pot with no geographical borders.

"I have a cultural map in my head," he told the Daily Telegraph in 2002, "where I find similarities between different cultures. For example, domestic Japanese pop music sounds like Arabic music to me — the vocal intonations and vibrato — and, in my mind, Bali is next to New York. Maybe everyone has these geographies in their head. This is the way I've been working."

On the 1989 album "Beauty," he played in a nine-piece band with musicians from England, the United States, Brazil, and Japan. In 1997 he released "Discord," a work in four movements that combined a 70-piece orchestra, a DJ, and text narrated by Bertolucci, Byrne, and Patti Smith, that Mr. Sakamoto wrote based on his conversations with former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev and the Dalai Lama about salvation.

In 2001, Mr. Sakamoto recorded an entire album of bossa nova, "Casa," that was recorded in Rio de Janeiro at the home of the late Antonio Carlos Jobim, using the same piano on which Jobin wrote "The Girl From Ipanema."

Mr. Sakamoto, who had lived in New York City since 1990, was married several times, including to pop singer Akiko Yano. He leaves his wife Norika Sora, who was also his manager; and several children, including singer Miu Sakamoto from his marriage to Yano.

More gloom than bloom

With sales down, and mortgage rates up, the spring housing market looks like tough going

By Ryan Huddle

GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

Greater Boston's housing market over the last few years has been anything but normal.

Prices soared to staggering heights in 2021 and 2022. (Remember last summer when the median-price for a single-family home in the region hit $900,000?) And now things have cooled dramatically. Home prices have declined year-over-year three months in a row for the first time in years, hitting new lows in February.

Through it all, one thing has remained constant: It is immensely difficult to buy a house here.

When homes change hands at a faster pace, it relieves some pressure on the rental market, as renters with enough income have more options to choose from for a first home. When they don't, those renters stay put, tightening up the rental market and leaving prices with nowhere to go but up. That's what's happening now.

So after a rocky few years, what comes next? Could we finally see the housing market return to normalcy?

These charts offer a glimpse of where things may be headed in the spring:

The explosion of home prices in 2021 and 2022 accelerated a trend that had been years in the making: Residents are moving farther and farther away from Boston to purchase homes that meet their needs, and that they can afford. And if they're still seeking an urban environment, there are a few obvious choices.

Worcester, Springfield, and Pittsfield were high on that list in 2021 and 2022. Sales of single-family homes were way up in those cities, and prices were too. Realtors expect that trend to continue in the spring and into the next few years as people continue to strike out in Greater Boston's supercharged market.

Prices in and around Boston are still sky high, and that's not likely to change anytime soon, barring some massive increase in supply to relieve pressure on the market. Just look at suburbs like Wellesley, where the median-priced single-family home cost $1.8 million in 2022.

Prices hit an all-time high last summer, but have drifted down consider-

A push to expand access to digital health tools

By Ambar Castillo
STAT

LAWRENCE — Herman Quintero was cracking jokes about the lottery, touching just below his right eye for luck. It came down to the Mega Millions to pay the medical bill he pulled up on the Patient Gateway app on his phone. Or somebody lending a hand, he said, eyes puckish as they peered out from under a navy blue Tigers baseball cap — a relic of his years working on a car assembly line in Detroit — and over at the digital access coordinator sitting beside him. Janelle Vargas shook her head. After two years helping him navigate his health care online, she was used to Quintero's quips.

It was Vargas who helped him learn how to pull up his bill, or check on the long list of medications — souvenirs from several surgeries, a hodgepodge of hip replacements and carpal tunnel release — in his records on the Massachusetts General Brigham electronic patient portal.

A reformed technophobe, 65-year-old Quintero sometimes still relies on family members to help him do phone and e-mail functions he refers to as "social media." On a recent Thursday, he stopped holding court with receptionists at the medical offices long enough to ask for Vargas's

Businesses still want a break on COVID jobless aid surcharge

But business owners aren't celebrating.

Many are still peeved that they are being required to pay back — through a special tax surcharge — the $2.7 billion in bonds sold by the state to retire the unemployment insurance (UI) trust fund's federal loans. They're also unhappy that they must cover other UI costs incurred by the old Baker administration and the new Healey team.

"The state mandated these businesses close their doors and restrict their operations, which resulted in layoffs," said Chris Carlozzi, Massachusetts director of the National Federation of Independent Business. "It is unfair that employers are left to shoulder the financial burden of the post-pandemic

SWISS PROSECUTOR OPENS PROBE INTO CREDIT SUISSE TAKEOVER

The Swiss Attorney General's Office has opened an investigation into the government-brokered takeover of Credit Suisse Group AG by UBS Group AG and is gathering evidence to identify possible crimes. The prosecutor didn't specify whether it's looking for breaches of law by government officials, bank executives, or journalists who reported on the closed-door negotiations. The financial regulator Finma last weekend said it was "exploring options" on how to hold bank managers accountable who are suspected of negligently handling risks leading up to the near-collapse of Credit Suisse. Meanwhile, UBS will cut its workforce by between 20 percent and 30 percent after completing its takeover of Credit Suisse, slashing as many as 36,000 jobs worldwide, SonntagsZeitung reported, citing an unidentified senior manager at UBS. That number of predicted layoffs dwarfs the 9,000 job cuts that Credit Suisse announced before its rescue by UBS last month. — BLOOMBERG NEWS

SPAC TIED TO TRUMP MEDIA RUSHES TO COMPLETE DEAL

Nearly 18 months ago, an obscure investment banker unveiled a blockbuster deal: His so-called blank-check company would bankroll a social media outfit that former president Donald Trump planned to start with hundreds of millions of dollars. Today, the social media platform Truth Social has millions of users, including the former president. But the company that was supposed to bankroll it has been swarmed by federal investigators. In late March, the deal's architect, Patrick Orlando, was ousted as CEO of Digital World Acquisition Corp. Officials at Digital World hoped that Orlando's departure would lead to the approval of the merger with Truth Social's parent company, Trump Media & Technology Group, according to three people briefed on the matter. That deal has been waylaid by two intensifying federal investigations. One is focused on whether preliminary merger discussions between Digital World and Trump Media violated federal securities laws. The other investigation is looking at whether a group of early investors in Digital World — who were brought into the deal by Orlando — engaged in improper trading. If the merger is not completed in the next six months, Digital World — established as a special purpose acquisition corporation — will have to return the $300 million it raised from investors in 2021 through an initial public offering. It is not clear that the investigations will be completed in time to permit the SEC to approve the merger as required. — NEW YORK TIMES

TWITTER PULLS CHECK MARK FROM MAIN NEW YORK TIMES ACCOUNT

Twitter has removed the verification check mark on the main account of The New York Times. The removal comes as many of Twitter's high-profile users are bracing for the loss of the blue check marks that helped verify their identity and distinguish them from imposters on the social media platform. Musk, who owns Twitter, set a deadline of Saturday for verified users to buy a premium Twitter subscription or lose the checks on their profiles. The Times said in a story Thursday that it would not pay Twitter for verification of its institutional accounts. Early Sunday, Musk tweeted that the Times' check mark would be removed. Later he posted disparaging remarks about the newspaper, which has aggressively reported on Twitter and on flaws with partially automated driving systems at Tesla, the electric car company, which he also runs. Other Times accounts such as its business news and opinion pages still had either blue or gold check marks on Sunday, as did multiple reporters for the news organization. "We aren't planning to pay the monthly fee for check mark status for our institutional Twitter accounts," the Times said in a statement Sunday. The Associated Press, which has said it also will not pay for the check marks, still had them on its accounts at midday Sunday. — ASSOCIATED PRESS

TESLA SALES ROSE IN THE FIRST QUARTER

Tesla sales rose 5 percent in the first three months of the year after it cut prices on its electric cars, helping to compensate for slowing economic growth and rising interest rates. Tesla said Sunday that it delivered nearly 423,000 vehicles from January through March, up from 405,000 in the last quarter of 2022. It delivered 310,000 vehicles in the first quarter of 2022. The 36 percent increase from a year ago "indicates that demand for EVs remains strong, with Tesla the safe choice among EV buyers," said Ben Rose, president of Battle Road Research. All automakers are contending with rising interest rates, which increase the cost of monthly car payments. But the Tesla sales figures could disappoint some investors who were expecting sales to top 430,000 vehicles in the quarter. — NEW YORK TIMES

In surprise, OPEC+ announces cut in oil production

By Clifford Krauss
NEW YORK TIMES

Saudi Arabia, Russia, and their oil producing allies announced Sunday that they would cut production by nearly 1.2 million barrels of crude a day, or more than 1 percent of world supplies, in an apparent effort to increase prices.

The move was unexpected because leaders of the group, known collectively as OPEC+, had said in recent days that they did not intend to make changes in their policies. While the announcement was a surprise, its significance may be slight, especially if the global economy slows.

The alliance produced nearly 2 million barrels below its supply target in February, the last month for which official output figures are available. "We expect shortfalls to continue," said Ha Nguyen, a global oil analyst for S&P Global Commodity Insights.

There have been persistent reports that Russia is struggling to keep up production without the benefit of Western service companies that have wound down their operations since the Russian invasion of Ukraine more than a year ago. Saudi production has also been below its production quota set by Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries in recent months.

Taking up the slack in supplying the 100 million-barrel-a-day global market are Brazil, Canada, Guyana, Norway, and the United States. All are increasing their oil production.

Still, the OPEC+ action has symbolic importance at a time when oil prices are a third below where they were immediately after Russia's invasion of Ukraine last February. OPEC+ members may be responding to growing fears of a recession this year in the wake of the failure of several American and European banks as well as central bankers' continued efforts to tame inflation. Oil demand has also been undercut by strikes in France, including at refineries.

"We don't think cuts are advisable at this moment given market uncertainty," said Adrienne Watson, a spokesperson with the US National Security Council, adding, "We're focused on prices for American consumers, not barrels, and prices have come down significantly since last year."

Saudi Arabia and Russia will lead in making the announced cuts, with declines of 500,000 barrels each, followed by Iraq, United Arab Emirates, and Kuwait.

Some analysts said the move could spur more investor speculative interest in oil futures and help drive oil prices higher in coming weeks.

"I really am surprised," said Tom Kloza, global head of energy analysis at the Oil Price Information Service. Kloza said he expected that the Brent global oil price benchmark, which has been hovering at $75 to $80 a barrel in recent weeks, would climb above $80. In recent years, Saudi Arabia, the leader of the group, has appeared determined to lift prices to around $90 a barrel.

The cuts, which are voluntary and start in May, could be temporary depending on economic conditions.

Just last week, Saudi Aramco, the Saudi state oil company, announced two deals with China to supply refineries there with 690,000 barrels a day. Demand for oil continues to rebound from the global slowdown amid the COVID-19 pandemic.

World diesel demand has nearly recovered to the levels of before the pandemic, and jet fuel demand continues to surge as China emerges from its COVID shutdown.

The cuts come as gasoline prices, still well below where they were a year ago, are rising again.

The average price for regular gasoline in the United States on Sunday was $3.51 a gallon, 13 cents above a month ago. The price a year ago was $4.20 a gallon, and was a major factor in the rise of inflation.

The cartel agreed in October to output cuts of 2 million barrels a day, but the ultimate reduction was well below that as producing countries such as Libya and Nigeria agreed to cut levels that they could not reach anyway.

The group had last slashed production in 2020 when demand collapsed because of the pandemic. It gradually increased production until October.

UI crisis."

The UI trust fund is back in the news thanks to my colleague Shirley Leung, who on Thursday broke the story that Governor Maura Healey's Executive Office of Labor and Workforce Development is seeking to finally close the books on a bureaucratic mess that ensnared 590,000 unemployment recipients.

Starting in early 2022, Shirley and I wrote a series of stories about how the state — swamped by millions of jobless claims and side-swiped by rapidly changing federal rules — paid $4.3 billion in federal and state jobless benefits to 590,000 people who were later deemed ineligible.

At the time, the Department of Unemployment Assistance was dunning claimants for the money, which many had already spent on necessities while they were out of work.

It took too long, but the DUA eventually rolled out a plan last April for a streamlined "one-click" process to waive these so-called overpayments. About 81 percent of overpayment cases have been resolved through waivers, at an estimated cost of $910 million to the federal government and $221 million to the state UI fund —a hit that employers will have to make up through unemployment taxes.

Now, according to Shirley, the Healey administration will give 59,000 recipients more time to resolve their cases — the one-click program expired in October — at an added cost of $323 million to the feds and $17 million to the UI fund. At the same time, the state will this week begin the process of intercepting Massachusetts and federal tax refunds to recoup $719 million from 112,000 others.

STEVEN SENNE/ASSOCIATED PRESS

Cutting costs for employers who fund the state's unemployment insurance system wasn't a top priority under Charlie Baker. Will Governor Maura Healey push for change?

In response, some business leaders are once again urging Beacon Hill to compensate the UI trust fund for the costs of granting the waivers — using some of the $1.7 billion that the state has from unallocated federal stimulus money and its budget surplus.

Jon Hurst, president of the Retailers Association of Massachusetts, notes that the Legislature last year allocated $100 million to the trust fund to cover waivers, less than the $300 million pressed for by the Baker administration.

"If the state were to cover the originally planned additional $200 million for overpayments, that could arguably reduce the COVID assessment by 10 percent," he said.

The trust fund balance was $3.91 billion at the end of last year. Absent a spike in unemployment, it's expected to wrap up this year with $3.6 billion, more than twice the money it had in December 2019, before COVID-19 upended the economy.

Moreover, the $2.3 billion the state borrowed from the US Treasury to cover jobless claims during the darkest days of 2020 and 2021 has been paid back using proceeds from the aforementioned bond sale. But that leaves employers to cover principal and interest payments through the aforementioned COVID tax surcharge.

I know, you may have had enough of employers' endless harping on the state's generous UI benefits and the COVID assessment.

But they have a legitimate gripe about being required to bear the costs of overpayment waivers and the bond sale: Most had no choice but to cut jobs during the COVID shutdown. Lawmakers pushed the waivers but never took action on proposed fixes that could have lowered UI taxes.

At the very least, the Legislature should send the trust fund the $200 million it declined to provide last year.

Spring housing market looks like tough going ably since. That's in large part due to interest rates, which have nearly doubled over the last year. In February, the median-priced single-family home in Greater Boston cost around $700,000, $200,000 less than the June peak.

But don't expect that to last. The winter months nearly always bring about a seasonal downturn in the housing market, and prices are likely to start swinging up again in the coming spring and summer. Though interest rates may well keep a lid on things this year.

Mortgage rates are largely to blame for the downturn in the housing market. The average 30-year fixed-rate mortgage had hovered between 2 and 4 percent for more than a decade, but has shot up over the last year. This week, that rate sits at 6.42 percent, according to Freddie Mac.

The rapid rise in rates means that people who were thinking of selling may be reconsidering, because they don't want to give up the rate they've locked in on their current home. A recent analysis from Goldman Sachs found that 99 percent of loan holders in the United States pay a lower rate than today's average on a 30-year mortgage.

And if nobody wants to sell, the housing market freezes up.

When interest rates double as they have, the costs facing new homebuyers become substantially higher. A monthly payment on a median-priced house in Greater Boston is now almost $1,000 higher than it was on the same-priced house a year ago.

For a lot of people, that means their monthly payment would be significantly higher than what they pay in rent.

It's anybody's guess as to what happens with interest rates in the coming months. If they go down, economists believe we could be in for an upswing in housing market activity, and that home prices will likely return to their typical upward trajectory. If not, home buying will likely still pick back up in the spring and summer, but not at the same pace that we've seen over the last few years.

Besides folks at home, Quintero can count on one callused hand the contacts he has on his cellphone, and one of them is Vargas's direct line in case he gets locked out of Patient Gateway, his patient portal.

Quintero was one of the first patients Vargas served in a program to pilot "digital access coordinators" at Pentucket Medical Riverwalk, a multi-specialty site in Lawrence that's part of the Mass General Brigham system. The program helps train patients in digital health tools like electronic health records, online registration forms, and home blood pressure cuffs. The coordinators help prepare patients for virtual visits, explain the ins and outs of video calls, and take note of any tech or health patient concerns providers might need to know.

The DAC program was piloted as part of MGB's United Against Racism health equity effort, which is centered on supporting diverse staff, leaders, and systems and multilingual communications. This emphasis on diversity is why it's critical that digital access coordinators, or DACs, come from the community, said Allison Bryant, the senior medical director for health equity at MGB. People in the role only need to have a high school degree and be proficient in English.

What matters most is that "many of our patients have felt very comfortable that the DAC is someone who might look like their granddaughter or might be whomever else," Bryant said.

During the 2020 lockdown, before the DAC launch, bilingual high school students from cities such as Chelsea, Boston, Revere, and Everett worked remotely in a similar role through a Mass General Hospital student program. "The idea was, in theory, students are a little bit more technosavvy and so this was leveraging that workforce," said Aswita Tan-McGrory, director of the Disparities Solutions Center at Mass General Hospital. "Videos and tip sheets only go so far. And what you really need is a warm human being to show you how to do this, and preferably somebody who speaks your language if there's a language barrier."

The teams saw that white, English-speaking-patients were much more likely than Black, Latinx, and non-English speaking patients to be active users of their patient portal.

Rachel Sisodia, chief quality officer at MGB, found structural racism even in basic office operations: MGB front desk staff were handing out iPads for patients to report health outcomes 20 percent less frequently to patients who were not white. When she discovered this, before the pandemic hit or the DAC program launched, she started sending out weekly reports on how much the numbers varied based on demographics. It took only a week to close that gap.

When the COVID-19 pandemic hit, Patient Gateway engagement for Black patients dropped by nearly half "almost overnight," Sisodia said. Even though the MGB team fully translated its portal information into Spanish, engagement rates among Hispanic patients dropped to 4 percent.

Initially, the team aimed to increase the Patient Gateway enrollment of Black and Latinx patients by 15 percent. They started small, by automatically texting or e-mailing patients to enroll in the portal, and then launched the DAC pilot.

Already, they've hit that goal. The health system sees enrollment as a major measure of progress, in part because of the crucial role the portal plays in patient-provider communication. When Quintero contracted a urinary tract infection, his longtime doctor wasn't available, so a nurse practitioner was assigned to his case. Later, at home and in pain, he found out the provider had prescribed the wrong antibiotic. After he was unable to ask the nurse practitioner questions, he sent his doctor a message through the portal that night to let him know and coordinate pickup for the new medication.

Building relationships with providers and front-desk staff helps facilitate a "warm handoff" from those clinicians, explained Michelle Zelen, senior program manager in digital access at MGB.

Another key part of the work is addressing patients' language needs. That starts with accurately collecting demographic information on patients, including race, ethnicity, and language spoken, Bryant said: "If we're not measuring things accurately, we're not doing anyone any justice."

Patient Gateway has been translated into seven commonly used languages among MGB patients: English, Spanish, Portuguese, Arabic, Traditional Chinese, Haitian Creole, and Russian. But one outstanding issue her department has yet to solve is how to perfectly match up a multilingual DAC workforce with patient needs: "If you happen to be in [one location] and you speak Mandarin, but the Mandarin-speaking DAC is working centrally or somewhere else, how do we link those things up?"

For now, bilingual DACs who don't speak the patient's primary language use virtual interpreters when necessary.

For Vargas, a Dominican native, the site in Lawrence was an ideal place to use her bilingual skills and cultural knowledge.

"A person, for example, that just came from their country, that doesn't know the language, that maybe has problems using technology, they may not even know that these resources are available to them," Vargas said.

The DAC team works to consider not just whether a patient is aware of their digital health options but also what their preferences are.

"I've had interactions, or some of the navigators have had interactions, with patients who are just not interested," said Jorge Rodriguez, a clinician-investigator at Brigham and Women's Hospital who serves as a medical adviser for the DAC program. "They're like, 'I love just going to see my doctor in person.'"

Rodriguez said the second part of digital equity involves ensuring access to broadband and affordable devices. Under the DAC program, MGB gives out iPads for patients to take home to log into their portals. While the devices don't address potential broadband issues, patients who lack access often bring their devices elsewhere or choose to log in at the facility on their own or the DACs' devices.

"Then you have another layer which is, even if you have the tool in your hand and you're able to pay for it, are you actually able to use it?" Rodriguez said. "And that's really where the digital navigators come in."

Even Vargas, who has become a familiar face in the DAC program, sometimes encounters hesitation from patients she approaches with an offer to help.

"People don't realize that there's also a cultural aspect to it," Vargas said. "Some people might be skeptical, and say, 'oh, what, are you trying to sell me insurance?'" With these patients, her main task is education. She explains that Patient Gateway would help them contact their providers and make virtual visits.

For many of the older, mostly Dominican, Puerto Rican, and other Latino patients at Pentucket, the hurdle is a deep-seated distrust of anything digital. Some are "old school, they don't want to be on social media," Quintero said. "I was like that, too. Some people think it's political propaganda to get you online."

Quintero leaned forward in his seat, inviting shared confidences about neighbors navigating Big Brother.

"You want to know how bad it is?" he said. "I got a buddy of mine who lives next door to me. Every time we come to a [traffic] light and there's a camera, he covers his face and [yells] 'They're watching us!' ... And I'm like, 'Dude, they're not gonna do nothing.'"

For some, that fear is heightened in any kind of medical or public health institution.

DACs also have to navigate the digital literacy divide. Sisodia's research has cited studies that show it takes people with a 12th-grade reading level much less time to navigate to their lab results on an "out-of-the-box" patient portal than those with a sixth-grade reading level. But making sure patients understand the platforms is part of the work they do day in and day out.

Quintero said his tech skills are proof enough of the maxim that old dogs can learn new tricks. Even as he's better able to navigate the Patient Gateway, at home he leaves it to his wife to help him with phone login issues and alert him to new messages on the app.

Quintero recounted bumping into an 89-year-old man at the neighborhood liquor store while playing numbers the week before. The man gave him some free advice: The secret to keeping your freedom for as long as possible was always staying active.

On his recent visit, after a conversation with Vargas where she ran through Zoom with him for his upcoming televisit, and guided him to an appointment e-mail notice, Quintero carelessly slipped his phone into the pocket of his military-green jacket. His devices had the habit of "mysteriously falling" to their deaths under his watch. Before he left, he stopped to say goodbye to his "people," including the nurse who'd just jabbed him with an allergy shot. Back home, he had chickens and cars to care for — the kind of work he could do without squinting at a screen that might always be a bit out of reach.

PROPONENT: Massachusetts Department of Transportation

This notice is being published to solicit public comments regarding the above-referenced federal aid transportation improvement project pursuant to Section 4(f) of the U.S. Department of Transportation (DOT) Act of 1966 (23 CFR 774). Information specific to the proposed project and its impacts, avoidance, minimization, mitigation, or enhancement measures may be obtained from: James Carney, 10 Park Plaza Room 7360, Boston, MA 02116, (james.n.carney@dot.state.ma.us)

The Town of Milton in conjunction with the Massachusetts Department of Transportation (MassDOT) proposes to replace the existing signalized intersection of Route 28 (Randolph Avenue) and Chickatawbut Road with a two-lane roundabout with pedestrian hybrid beacons (PHB) at Route 28 (Randolph Avenue) crossings for pedestrians, and rectangular rapid flashing beacons (RRFB) at the Chickatawbut Road crossings for pedestrians, respectively. The project, as designed, will require six permanent easements on the Blue Hills Reservation for roadway reconstruction, utility pole relocation, proposed drainage, traffic signals, proposed retaining wall, proposed soil nail wall, and bioretention area installation. The project will also require two temporary occupancies on the Blue Hills Reservation. These temporary occupancies are required for roadway reconstruction, utility pole relocation, proposed drainage, and traffic signals. The park, which is owned by the Department of Conservation & Recreation, is protected as a significant public conservation and recreational resource under Section 4(f) of the DOT Act.

MassDOT intends to pursue a determination that the proposed use of the permanent easements for the construction of roadway reconstruction, utility pole relocation, proposed drainage, traffic signals, proposed retaining wall, proposed soil nail wall, and bioretention area installation within the reservation meets the definition of de minimis (or minor) impacts, as specified under 23 CFR 774.17(5). A de minimis finding is being made based on the preliminary assessment that the proposed use of this resource will have no adverse effects on the recreational activities, features or attributes qualifying it for Section 4(f) protection. All persons wishing to comment on the project should write or email to the address noted above within 15 days of this notice. Comments will become part of the official record and will be considered when making future project-related decisions.

The blame game began in Eden: Adam blamed Eve, she blamed the serpent, and he had not a leg to stand on. Even today, some people won't take the blame for a foul-up until they exhaust every other possibility.

Today's West led the 10 of hearts against 3NT, and dummy won and led the queen of diamonds. When East took the king, he returned ... a heart. West won the next diamond and led a third heart, but South won and ran the diamonds. East was stuck for discards, and South wound up with 11 tricks.

"I expected your hearts to be Q-10-9-x-x," East told his partner.

It's not whether you win or lose but how you place the blame. East had a sure thing by leading the deuce of spades at Trick Three. When West took the ace of diamonds, he could lead another spade, and East would get three spade tricks.

As for East's don't-blame-me comment, once West showed the ace of diamonds, he could hardly hold another queen. Then South would have at most five points for his 1NT bid.

DAILY QUESTION You hold: ♠ A Q 9 2 ♡ 7 5 2 ♢ K ♣ Q 9 7 3 2. The dealer, at your left, opens one heart. Your partner doubles, and the next player raises to two hearts. What do you say?

ANSWER: Your partner has opening values or more with support for the unbid suits, especially spades. (He may have a powerful hand with a suit he intends to bid; that seems unlikely here.) Your hand is too promising for an invitational jump to three spades. Cue-bid three hearts.

HOROSCOPE

HAPPY BIRTHDAY for Monday, April 3, 2023:
You like to be at the center of things as someone indispensable to an important cause. You love a challenge, and you thrive dealing with groups. This is a year of change, which means you have to be flexible and courageous. Expect to increase your personal freedom and travel.

ARIES (March 21-April 19)
Begin this week with care and caution because, for starters, you might be at odds with someone in a position of authority -- a parent, boss, teacher or member of the police. In addition, surprises at work or surprises related to your earnings or your possessions might catch you off guard. Tread carefully! Tonight: Work.
TAURUS (April 20-May 20)
You feel impulsive and impatient. In particular, you might feel this way when dealing with kids or a romantic partner. However, it will also manifest in sports or if you're involved in the entertainment world. Hidden arguments might take place behind the scenes. Easy does it. Tonight: Relax.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20)
Squabbles with friends or members of groups might take place today. This could relate to some impulsive social outings that you're planning. ("Busted!") It might even relate to a hidden love affair. If you have transgressed, come clean. Your first loss is your cheapest loss. Tonight: Cocoon.
CANCER (June 21-July 22)
This is a poor day to confront authority figures, so be aware of this right from the get-go. Do not choose today to ask for permission or approval for anything. Postpone this request. Meanwhile, a member of a group or a friend might do or say something that surprises you. Stay tuned. Tonight: Friendly conversations.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22)
Steer clear of controversial subjects like religion, politics and racial issues, because they could escalate quickly into something nasty. In fact, discussions about travel, publishing, higher education, medicine or the law also might trigger power struggles. Tonight: Count your money.
VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22)
Today you're full of electric, restless energy because the Moon is in your sign dancing with unpredictable Uranus. Be careful about overreacting or having a knee-jerk reaction to discussions about shared property or shared responsibilities. You might not agree with someone else's values. Be cool. Tonight: You're fine.
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22)
Quarrels with partners and close friends might arise. If so, they are basically power struggles. Something unexpected that impacts your property, debt or a loan might trigger a dispute, or it could be about a basic difference in values. Tonight: Enjoy solitude.
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21)
Be patient with co-workers, customers and clients today. If you are angry, curt or rude, you will likely regret it later. Chalk it up to the job. It goes with the territory. Generally, it's not wise to burn bridges. You never know what the future holds. Tonight: Be friendly.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21)
Parents must be patient with their kids, because this is the classic day for meltdowns. Meanwhile, romantic partners must be patient with each other if they want to stay together. It often boils down to: "You can be right -- or you can be in the relationship." Tonight: Show respect.
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19)
Family quarrels, especially about repairs or real-estate plans, might arise. Possibly, they relate to something unexpected that affects one of your kids. Whatever the case, maintain your chill. We all have quarrelsome days. Patience is the antidote to anger. Tonight: Explore!
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18)
You might come on too strong when dealing with others today. Or possibly you will attract someone to you who does this. Either way, aggressive communication never accomplishes what you hope it will. In fact, people are more likely to listen when you whisper. For your own benefit, be patient with yourself and others. Tonight: Check your finances.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20)
Arguments about money or possessions might arise. Do be careful and pay attention to everything you say and do, because this is an accident-prone day for you. Keep your eyes open, and definitely think before you act. That way, no regrets. Tonight: Cooperate.

TV CRITIC'S CORNER

NETFLIX

Steven Yeun (left) and Young Mazino in "Beef," a Netflix comedy also starring Ali Wong.

This week: A road-rage comedy, a Beach Boys celebration, and the return of 'Schmigadoon!'

1. "Transatlantic" is a seven-episode limited series based on Julie Orringer's 2019 novel "The Flight Portfolio." From the creator of the extraordinary "Unorthodox," Anna Winger, it's a fictionalized version of the story of Varian Fry, an American journalist who in 1940 created an organization to help intellectuals, artists, and writers flee the Nazis and come to the United States. The international cast includes Cory Michael Smith, Gillian Jacobs, Corey Stoll, Jodhi May, and Amit Rahav. It premieres Friday on Netflix.

2. Has the world been waiting for a road-rage comedy? I'm thinking the answer is a big yes, even if the show, called "Beef," is not set amid the utter derangement of a Boston traffic circle. Ali Wong and Steven Yeun star as strangers whose road-rage incident — he almost backs his truck into her car — triggers all kinds of twisted reactions across 10 half-hour episodes. Misdirected anger, thy name is traffic. The show premieres Thursday on Netflix.

3. Based on the stories by Cheryl Strayed, "Tiny Beautiful Things" gives us Kathryn Hahn as an advice columnist whose life is falling apart. Her marriage to her husband is breaking down, her daughter will barely talk to her, and her writing career is at a standstill. If the tagline is any indication, I'm gonna like this one: "Broken is a beautiful place to start." The limited series — eight 30-minute episodes — will premiere Friday on Hulu.

4. Apple TV+'s musical spoof "Schmigadoon!" returns for a second season on Wednesday. The first series of six episodes had fun with the songs and cliches of classic musicals prior to the 1960s. The new set of six will goof on musicals such as "Hair," "Jesus Christ Superstar," "Cabaret," and "Chicago," and the season's subtitle is "Schmicago." Tituss Burgess joins the returning cast, including Keegan-Michael Key and Cecily Strong as the couple looking for renewal and Ariana DeBose, Kristin Chenoweth, Alan Cumming, Jane Krakowski, and Martin Short as a new group of supporting characters.

5. How do you milk the pre-existing public awareness of "Grease"? It's called "Grease: Rise of the Pink Ladies," and it's a 10-episode prequel musical series due to premiere Thursday on Paramount+. Set four years before the events of "Grease," it is about four outcasts at Rydell High just trying to have a good time. Moral panic ensues.

6. Based on the children's novel-in-verse by Kwame Alexander, "The Crossover" is about the coming-of-age of teen basketball phenoms and brothers Josh and Jordan. The adult Josh, voiced by Daveed Diggs, narrates the Disney+ series, which also involves the boys' former professional basketball player father. Jalyn Hall, Amir O'Neil, Derek Luke, Sabrina Revelle, Skyla I'Lece, Deja Monique Cruz, and Trevor Raine Bush star. It premieres Tuesday.

7. Wouldn't it be nice if you could get some good vibrations sitting at home in your room? God only knows, it's possible on Sunday at 8 p.m. CBS is offering fun, fun, fun and dance, dance, dance with "A Grammy Salute to the Beach Boys." And don't worry baby; if you record it, you can see it later and even do it again. Why, if you want, you can watch it all summer long. Performers include Beck, Brandi Carlile, Fall Out Boy, Hanson, Norah Jones, John Legend ("Sail on Sailor"), Little Big Town, Michael McDonald, Mumford & Sons, My Morning Jacket, Pentatonix, Charlie Puth ("Wouldn't It Be Nice"), LeAnn Rimes, St. Vincent, and Weezer (singing "California Girls").

ASK AMY

Partner flies off, right when he's needed

Q. My partner (we live together) owns a vacation home in the Southwest. Months ago, he made plans to take three of his teenage grandchildren there over spring break. After that plan was hatched, I was diagnosed with cancer and am undergoing chemotherapy.

I had hoped that he would cancel his plans so he could be at our home to help me out, but he went ahead and made airline reservations, after he knew that the dates of his vacation would coincide with my treatment. I am feeling hurt, rejected, and unimportant to him, in addition to feeling the ill effects of my treatment.

I could have used his help with meals, driving to the clinic, and overall companionship. My daughter, who has a full-time job, stepped in.

Amy, he rarely sees these grandchildren, who live within 15 minutes of us. Why couldn't he have scheduled spring break outings at home instead of traveling during this crucial time?

SAD AND SUFFERING

A. My mother once said to me, "Remember: People do what they want to do." When pondering disappointing choices people make that let you down, I think it helps to accept this simple truism.

On the face of it, your partner doesn't seem to have placed a high priority on being your stalwart helpmate. For many people, showing up during an emergency illness is a high calling. Doing so can elevate you to realize your own better nature.

Not so much for your guy, evidently.

One of the joys of being a good grandparent is to spend "quality time" with your grandchildren, indulging them with special experiences. More important, however, are the lasting lessons grandparents can impart to their grands — about stepping up, stepping in, and demonstrating your commitment to those who need you.

Factors that you don't mention could be related to how and why you two chose each other in the first place, such as whether he went through a divorce that has made him feel insecure and guilty toward his children and grandchildren.

Regardless, it looks like you are not spending your life with an "in sickness and in health" person. I hope you've chosen to talk to him about this, honestly expressing how this episode has made you feel.

Now that you know what he's like when the chips are down, you can move forward, understanding that when it comes to some of your greater needs, you should not necessarily count on him.

Q. I recently got a new job that I've been at for two months. Even though I just started and am still in my 90-day trial period, I feel like this job isn't the right fit for me.

I've been in the medical field for six years and within those years, I've been in and out of medical offices, either quitting or getting fired.

My question is: How do I stay at one job when I really don't like their values? (My manager declined to let me attend an appointment with my son's school because I'm still under my 90-day review.)

I've been looking for other employment, but I feel like it's going to be a never-ending cycle of leaving and being burnt out.

BURNT-OUT MOM

A. I agree that you are trapped in a never-ending cycle — of working in medical offices and then either quitting or being fired.

By this point, you've racked up an extremely poor work history, which I assume would negatively affect your ability to get another job at a quality medical practice.

My suggestion is that you should stop doing what you're doing.

Yes, you have a bad fit, but the poor fit involves you and the profession you seem to have chosen. Surely any prospective employers and their medical patients deserve to be treated by motivated and competent employees who are better suited to this oftentimes high-stress work environment than you seem to be.

You should be pursuing employment in another field.

You might receive some much-needed inspiration from reading "The Restart Roadmap: Rewire and Reset Your Career," by "Trading Secrets" podcaster Jason Tartick (2022, HarperCollins Leadership).

Q. Thank you for the thoughtful response to "Thin and Fit."

As someone who has been increasingly overweight (for complex reasons) since the age of 5 or 6, assumptions about obesity (like the letter writer's) are common and insulting.

Responses like yours make me feel seen and valued.

GRATEFUL
